MANY NATIONAL CONVENTIONS IN THE CAPITAL CITY—BRITISH AMBASSADOR GEDDES TELLS WOMEN OF GRAVE SITUATION IN WORLD TODAY—INFORMAL RECEPTION AT CAPITOL FOLLOWS VISIT TO WHITE HOUSE—GREAT THRONGS PAY HOMAGE TO MEMORY OF GRANT

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Many National Conventions In Capital City

Conventions have been the order of the week in Washington. Closely following the Annual Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution were the annual meetings of the Daughters of 1812, the League of American Penwomen, the International League for Peace and Freedom, and the Dames of the Loyal Legion. The Pan American Conference of Women, and The League of Women Voters convention, which were held in Baltimore, had a Washington Day. The Capital City gave a gala welcome to all the guests. Delegates to the League of Women Voters' convention, seven hundred strong, called on their Senators and Representatives. The delegates were guests at various luncheons and took part in a tree planting when Vice-President Coolidge spoke. Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes gave a tea at the beautiful Pan American Union when the South American delegates were the honor guests. Many visited the home of Woodrow Wilson—the former President appeared on the porch to speak words of appreciation of their coming. President and Mrs. Harding received all the delegations to the various conventions.

Lord and Lady Astor, Secretary of State Hughes, Ambassador Geddes, Director General Rowe, and Mrs. Robert Lansing addressed a great mass meeting over which Mrs. Maud Wood Park, president of the League of Women Voters, presided. Among the hundreds who packed the hall were representatives from twenty-two nations.

Ambassador Geddes Tells Women of Grave Situation In World Today

"The economic situation which confronts the world today constitutes the gravest menace in all history," was the statement of the British ambassador. "Millions of men, women and children are dying throughout the world for lack of food, lack of work, lack of those things which are necessary to life and happiness," he said, adding that this situation had become "the tragedy of the moment, and that behind this tragedy lies even greater danger, unless wisdom of pronounced character is exercised."

The ambassador remarked that although he could say a lot of nice things about women, he did not intend to, but was going to say something that would give the delegates a shock. His succeeding utterances caused a gasp and then a roar of applause when he declared:

"The trouble with all of you is that you are too ignorant. You must study the things that vitally affect the nation, for there are problems of particular interest basically which you should know and understand."

Informal Reception at Capitol Follows Visit to White House

Lady Astor, the former Virginia girl, who is on a triumphal return to the United States after conquering the hearts of Britons and becoming the first woman in the British House of Commons, gained an impression of the United States Senate in action.

Escorted by Senator Swanson, the member from her own home state; Senator Hitchcock and Senator John Sharp Williams, and accompanied by her husband, Lord Astor, and the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, a magistrate in England, now her traveling companion, the British peeress slipped into the Senate chamber during the roll call and for a few moments sat on the sidelines.

There was little more than routine transpiring, and she was interested chiefly in the various members who were, one by one, brought up and presented to her. The business of the morning was not interrupted. With each of the Senators she chatted, seeming to have something especial to say.

Her attitude of friendliness and geniality made a great impression on the galleries, chiefly composed of women, and many a word of admiration was heard over her trim figure, clad in a neat blue suit, with lavender vest and blue sailor hat.

Lady Astor stayed in the Senate chamber only ten minutes or so, dividing her time equally between Democratic and Republican sides.

Great Throngs Pay Homage to Memory of Grant

Thursday last the machinery of the government was halted by executive order of President Harding that the thousands of Federal employes might join in paying homage to the memory of Ulysses S. Grant, the Union chieftain and President, on the centenary of his birth.

An elaborate parade from the White House down Pennsylvania avenue to the foot of the Capitol Terrace—the same thoroughfare over which Grant's victorious army passed on May 23, 1865—preceded the dedication services of the monument erected in his honor.

Princess Cantacuzene, granddaughter, and Princess Ida, great-granddaughter of General Grant, unveiled the beautiful memorial which was dedicated to the nation by Union and Confederate veterans.

The Grant Memorial is one of the largest statuary groups in the world. The equestrian portion of it is said to be exceeded in height only by the statue of Victor Emmanuel in Rome. Fifteen years have been required to bring it to virtual completion.

The memorial takes its place in the national capital with the soon-to-be-dedicated Lincoln Memorial and the great monument which has stood for half a century as a memorial to Washington, and is a beautiful work of art. Occupying a position of prominence at the east end of the Botanic Gardens, facing the Capitol grounds, it has been approved by Augustus Saint Gaudens, Charles F. McKim, Daniel C. French and other prominent American artists.

The statue was authorized by Congress twenty-one years ago, but various causes contributed to the delay in the first memorial to Grant that the nation has provided. It was long in the making, as it was long in conception. Many years have passed since the first proposal.

In October, 1907, contractors began making excavations for the foundations of the memorial, but hardly had they started when an order from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia stopped the work, requiring the contractors to show cause why they should not be enjoined from cutting down certain historic trees in clearing for the site. It was not until May, 1908, that the contractors were able to resume work. The original contract called for the completion of the memorial within a period of five years, but it became necessary to extend that limit several times.

Cost of Memorial $250,000

The memorial involved the largest expenditure for statuary ever made by this government—$250,000. The legislation was enacted at the instance of the Army of the Tennessee, the organization commanded by General Grant until late in 1863, he was made General of the Armies.

Opening in Washington of Arbor Day Week, proclaimed by the President of the United States, was marked by the labeling of trees, one in LaFayette Park being the first. This marking of trees in the nation's capital with their common names is of the highest educational value. It is to be extended to many trees, so that the people of Washington and visitors may be able to recognize those in which the capital abounds. To the children of the city, the marking will be of great use in connection with their school studies.

The United States Supreme Court, in an opinion delivered by Justice Brandeis in a case brought by the Federal Trade Commission against the Winsted Hosiery Co., of Connecticut, ruled that labels or brands under which articles are sold, when open to construction in the mind of the purchasing public that they describe the component ingredients or materials used in the manufacture of the articles, must clearly and definitely describe them.

The opinion of the Court, while confined to the specific case presented, will, it is stated, have material effect in broadening the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission in such trade practices.

New Citizens of Nevada Must Swear to Obey Dry Laws

The largest naturalization class in Nevada's history assembled in the district court the other week to take the semi-annual examination for citizenship. Ever since the naturalization laws have required examinations an essential question has been whether the applicant will support and defend the Constitution of the United States, but now the government is going one step farther. According to the new practice in Nevada, says the Reno Gazette, petitioners must swear specifically that they will support the Eighteenth Amendment. If they do not give assurance that they will obey the dry laws of the country, they lose their chance of becoming American citizens.

Law Enforcement League in Delaware

The movement to form law enforcement leagues throughout the country is spreading. Supported by the churches of Dover, Delaware, it is estimated by the press that more than a thousand adults of that city have thus far enrolled in such a league, promising thereby to give their aid in the securing of the proper observance of the Eighteenth Amendment and in the enforcement of the state and federal laws for carrying out its provisions.

U. S. Consul General at Cairo, Egypt, Sets Precedent at Sans-Alcohol Dinner

"The prohibition movement in Egypt has received an unexepected impetus as the result of a dinner given by Dr. J. Morton Howell, the American consul-general, to Premier Sarwat Pasha and other government officials," says a special cablegram from Junius B. Wood to the Chicago Daily News, of date, April 24. "It was the first official function of the kind in this country without alcoholic liquors. Though the Mohammedan religion discourages the use of alcohol, liquors have invariably been served on state occasions when foreigners were present. Dr. Howell informed his guests that because the United States was dry he believed it would be improper for an American official to have liquor at his table. The premier responded by saying that a similar restriction demands the consideration of Egypt, greatly to the encouragement of the prohibition advocates."

Detroit Reports Decrease of Juvenile Delinquents

"A decrease in the number of alcoholic patients taken to the receiving hospital in Detroit to one-fifth of the number prior to prohibition, is a most encouraging result of the Eighteenth Amendment, according to a statement made by Edwin M. Mulock, chief probation officer of the recorder's court, at a meeting of the Social Workers' club held at the Industrial Women's Service Center in Detroit recently," says the Pontiac (Mich.) Press.

"Fred M. Butzel, of the board of directors of the House of Correction, emphasized the fact that since prohibition the saloon has ceased to be the controlling factor in politics.

"The most hopeful outlook was presented by Judge Henry Hulbert, long experienced in Juvenile court work, who stated that the number of juvenile delinquents in court is gradually but steadily decreasing." The judge considers the elimination of the liquor traffic in connection with dance halls and cafes, where formerly young girls from thirteen years up became liquor addicts, one of the factors that have been instrumental in bringing about this improved condition.

Governor Denney Proclaims Law Enforcement Week

State of Delaware, Executive Department

We who live in the state of Delaware, the first to ratify the Constitution of the United States, are proud of its traditions and its strong position as the champion of law and order from the beginning of its history. The peace, comfort, stability and confidence we enjoy and accept as a part of our national endowment are unsurpassed elsewhere in the world. All are made possible because of the form of government under which we live, guaranteeing, as it does, independence to the individual, good order to society, and protection against all who would destroy them. This form of government, however, rests for its ultimate success on the foundations of genuine respect and devotion which the people have for its ordinances.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land, which safeguards the welfare of the United States. No Federal statute, no treaties and no legislative enactments in the states can either nullify or impair it. All Federal and state officials are sworn to obey it and every citizen is not only legally but morally bound to respect it. In proportion as it is weakened by disregard of law or deprived of the loyal support of our people, everything good and safe in the land is endangered. Loyalty to our Constitution and wholehearted obedience to its provisions are essential to our very existence as a nation.

Within the last three years our people have undertaken the difficult task of enforcing the prohibition amendment by Federal and state statutes. The prohibition legislation, constitutional and statutory, was enacted because of the nation-wide protest against the manifest evil that attended the traffic and indulgence in intoxicating liquors.

The illicit sale of liquor is too prevalent. Therefore, I earnestly appeal to all citizens of Delaware to give the laws, particularly the prohibition laws, their support in a wholehearted and determined way. The task of law enforcement is worthy of our best endeavors.

To that end I hereby designate and set aside the week beginning Sunday, April 23, and ending Saturday, April 29, 1922, to be known as "Law Enforcement Week."

Let us during that week concentrate our best efforts, spiritually and materially, to encourage and assist those whose duty it is to enforce the laws in our state, and nation, and as an aid thereto I suggest that appropriate services and exercises be held in our churches, schools and public buildings.

(Signed) WILLIAM D. DENNEY,
Governor of Delaware.

Young Women's Christian Association Adopts Resolution for Enforcement of Eighteenth Amendment

The Young Women's Christian Association at its national convention, which met last week in Hot Springs, Arkansas, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, that we go on record for the observance of law and especially for the strict enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment."

Prohibition Lessens Police Force

Since national prohibition went into effect, there has been so great a decrease in the number of arrests in Westerly, Rhode Island, according to the Westerly Sun, that the police committee, which had been making a preliminary study of the costs of the police department, decided to drop an officer taken on in 1911, when the crime record was so high that it was found necessary to add to the strength of the police force. There were during that year 148 arrests for drunkenness, revelling and assault as against a total last year of only 44, and it must be remembered that this, too, was a year when there was a crime wave that swept the country, and much unemployment. The average national prohibition years show a decrease in arrests for drunkenness of 64 per cent from the average license or wet years. On other arrests there has been a falling off of 41 per cent.

Blind Pigs Ousted in California County

Some time ago operatives of the California Law Enforcement League secured evidence against the blind-pigs of San Rafael with the result that the places were closed and their proprietors either jailed or driven out of the county. A dispatch to the State Law Enforcement League Record from San Rafael under recent date sets forth that "for the first time in its history, the Marin County jail is empty."

School Principal Places Ban on Jokes on Prohibition

"Education tends to law enforcement and that is why we teach English and history so that children may overcome obstacles and become enlightened citizens," said C. K. Reiff, principal of the Central high school, in an address at a W. C. T. U. banquet recently held in Muskogee, Oklahoma. "The fundamental basis of citizenship is a nation by the people, a nation for the people, and a nation of the people. Unless the majority of the people believe in a basic citizenship, the law will not be enforced.

"In Central high school I will not tolerate any references to whisky and kindred subjects in either the class rooms or the auditorium. That is the trouble with the people as a whole now, they make jokes of the situation. Of course, many of them are what may be termed harmless jokes, but there is agitation in jokes of this character."

TURNING THE SEARCHLIGHT ON CHICAGO

CAN ANY BENEFITS FROM PROHIBITION BE FOUND IN LAKE MICHIGAN METROPOLIS? LEADING CITIZENS SAY AN EMPHATIC "YES"

The Chicago division of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment had declared that prohibition was an unmitigated failure in Chicago as elsewhere.

The pro-beer and wine newspapers of Chicago had been for months running a "blood and thunder" serial of law violation and "moonshine whisky" mortality, as the only news about prohibition.

The city council of Chicago had made itself notorious by passing a resolution favoring a modification of the Volstead Code to provide for the manufacture and sale of wine and beer, and had then sent out circular letters to councils of other cities asking them to do likewise.

In the face of these facts Chicago seemed a somewhat hopeless field in which to search for benefits from the dry law. But the one to whom the task was assigned reasoned that if, perchance, there should be discovered in that city a very few men, women or children who had profited in body, mind or soul by the Eighteenth Amendment, then without doubt in more favored territory there could be found an abundance of such evidence as to the value of the national prohibition law.

The following statements from various individuals, societies and departments of the city government speak for themselves:

From the Standpoint of Health

The year 1921 was heralded far and wide as a banner health year in the city of Chicago, the vital statistics furnished by its officials showing a marked decrease in deaths. When Dr. William H. Evans, for many years commissioner of health for Chicago, and now editor of the Health Department of the Chicago Tribune, was asked if prohibition had been a factor in this fine health record, he replied in the affirmative.

At the Department of Health, E. R. Pritchard, secretary of the board, gave expression to his sentiments in the following words: "From both health and economic standpoints prohibition has been of pronounced benefit. For people to be properly nourished, housed and clothed has a direct effect on our mortality statistics, and that is what prohibition has done."

Dr. John Dill Robertson, until very recently health commissioner of Chicago, gave the following statistical records of public institutions:

Alcoholic Cases in House of Correction (Bridewell)

1918 (last license year)	1772
1921	151

Total Alcohol Cases Reported

1918	1921
1921	1040

Visiting Nurses' Reports Say—

"Until the very tragic unemployment situation of last winter," said Miss Edna Foley, superintendent of the Visiting Nurses' Association, "we had never seen so many families to whom we minister well dressed and so many children with shoes and stockings as since prohibition. I think if we had not had the unemployment situation, prohibition's benefits would have been very noticeable. So many of our men are not now tempted because liquor is so expensive, whereas formerly it was cheap and on every street corner. We find that the women of the families with which we come in contact are almost universally for prohibition and want it continued. They realize it makes for better home and family life. I notice, too, as I talk with nurses in this city and other parts of the country, that liberal minded as they are, they are almost all believers in prohibition, for in their professional experience they have seen the evil effects of drink." Miss Foley called attention to the fact that the class of nurses recently graduated from a three years' course at Cook County hospital, which formerly had two or more wards used for delirium tremens cases, was the first class to finish its training without having actually seen a case of delirium tremens.

Marked Increase in Normal Family Life, Testifies Jane Addams

Having lived for many years within the "poverty belt" of Chicago, we find very striking changes due to the prohibition amendment. To cite figures from the United Charities:

Year	Undercare cases	Intemperance
1918	7,149	499
1921	5,547	61

The statistics from the House of Correction:

Year	Commitments
1920	4,681

This decline in commitments for minor offenses is very significant in view of the existence of two factors which would have made for an increase in arrests had it not been for prohibition. These two factors are (1) the widespread unemployment, (2) the aftermath of the war, which has made for an increase of offenses in this as in other countries.

There is also a marked increase of normal family life due (1) to the fact of the larger amount of wages available for family use and (2) to the abolishment of the saloon.

JANE ADDAMS,
President Hull House.

United Charities Statistics Significant

The statistics obtained from the records of the United Charities of Chicago, showing a drop from 499 intemperance cases in 1918 to 61 in 1921, were illuminating. "Intemperance cases," representing extreme drunkenness, are kept in a separate classification, and do not include the so-called moderate drinking that makes a big hole often in the family pocket book and deprives the mother and children of comforts. Only the cases of extreme need caused by intemperance are shown by the following figures:

Year	Undercare cases	Intemperance
1918	7149	499
1919	6642	429
1920	5336	33
1921	5547	61

Prominent Banker Says—

In reply to a letter asking his opinion as to the effect of national prohibition on saving deposits and the thrift movement, Mr. John Jay Abbott, vice-president of the Continental and Commercial Trust and Savings Bank of Chicago, wrote:

"Since the date on which National Prohibition went into effect the savings deposits of this bank have increased approximately $10,000,000, or thirty per cent. There is no question but that prohibition has contributed very substantially to the increase of savings in the United States, and therefore has been of great economic value to the country."

Is Prohibition Worth While For the "Kiddies"?

If there were absolutely no advantage to adults from prohibition it would be conceded to be well worth while if it made better child life. That it does in the particular city under consideration is evident from the records of the Juvenile Court. In 1921 there was a decrease of nearly 1,000 cases of alleged delinquency over the year 1919 when war time prohibition went into effect. Mr. Joseph L. Moss, chief probation officer of the Juvenile Court, in his report for 1920, says: "National Prohibition has without question removed temptation and raised home standards in the community." In the light of this statement the following statistics are illuminating.

Alleged Delinquents Brought Before Juvenile Court

3036	3402	2550	241

What Prohibition Did to the Washingtonian Home and the Neal Institutes

No stronger testimony of the beneficial effects of the Eighteenth Amendment can be produced than the decrease in the number of residents in homes and institutes for the care of alcoholic cases. With the coming of national prohibition, the Neal Institute of Chicago went out of existence. In explanation of the disappearance of this and like institutions, B. A. Neal, head of the sixty or more Neal Institutes published a signed statement, under date of July 17, 1921, in the San Francisco Examiner, in which he said: 'I am president of sixty-five Neal institutes for the treatment of the 'drink habit' During the twelve years before the Volstead Act became effective, we treated more than 125,000 drinking men and women. Chicago and Cleveland institutes treated more than 100 patients a month. Los Angeles and San Francisco averaged 25 to 30 a month. New Institutes now operating do not average two patients a month. Nearly all the Neal Institutes have closed from lack of patronage and I am now devoting myself to another business."

Judge J. Kent Greene, president of the Washingtonian Home Association, probably the oldest operating institution of its kind in America, was interviewed, and told the writer of the closing, with the advent of prohibition, of the Washingtonian Home on West Madison Street, the place where for nearly half a century inebriates had been cared for. POSTER LESSON: WINE A PASS-KEY TO ALCOHOLISM

Cora Frances Stoddard

The following suggestions may be helpful in using with classes or other groups the poster of this title.

Aim: To show that wine is an alcoholic liquor; that the alcohol in it impairs efficiency; that because of the alcohol in them light wines tend to create a desire for stronger liquors:

I. All Wines Contain Alcohol

The Century Dictionary defines wine as, "The fermented juice of the grape or fruit of the vine."

"The leading characteristic of wine," says the same authority, "must be referred to the alcohol it contains and upon which its intoxicating (poisoning) powers principally depend." Do not teach methods of making wine, but make clear the fact that alcoholic fermentation produces alcohol in even home-made wines.

The idea of safety in moderate use of alcohol arose before precise methods were used to study its effects. The knowledge that wine will intoxicate is as old as its use and from the most ancient times men have been cautioned to avoid drinking enough wine to make them drunk. If they did this it was supposed they would escape harm.

As soon as men learned to use precise methods in scientific experimentation they were able to study the effects of smaller amounts of alcohol than those that caused drunkenness, and thereby they obtained proof that amounts previously considered moderate could cause varying degrees of injury.

Collect from ancient history incidents of drunkenness produced by wine. History and literature and Scripture abound with them. The dates of these incidents may be placed on the blackboard, or on charts and beside them the approximate dates of the introduction of distillation into Europe by the Arabian alchemists (Eleventh Century); for medical purposes (Thirteenth Century); the advent of distilled liquors into popular use as beverages (Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries).

II. Wine Impairs Working Ability

All bodily movements require some degree of control of the muscles by the nervous system. Much of the work of the civilized world requires a high degree of control of muscles by mind.

(In school, pupils may be asked as an illustration to draw a perfectly straight line, horizontal, vertical, oblique. Discuss the kind of control one must have to operate a typewriter rapidly and accurately; the meaning of efficiency in skilled work and its comparative value—to the individual worker, to his employer, to workers generally, to industry on a large scale.)

Evidence that wine or similar drinks containing alcohol lessen fine working ability has been collected from many sources. The best evidence comes from tests made on certain days without alcohol and on other days, under otherwise exactly similar conditions, with alcohol.

Some tests of this kind have been carried on by use of the typewriter. Frankfurther, a German university man, used the typewriter in a series of experiments in which he took on the alcohol days an amount of alcohol (40 c. c.) equal to that in half a pint of Malaga (17 per cent) wine. After using this amount he made seventeen times as many mistakes on the average as he did in similar tests with no alcohol.

Vernon, an English experimenter, also found a greater number of errors in typewriting after doses of alcohol (30 c. c.) equal to the amount in half a bottle of claret (13 per cent alcohol).

Professor Vogt of the University of Christiania found that it took him about five times as long to memorize twenty-five lines of Greek poetry after he had taken alcohol equivalent to half a pint of champagne (12 per cent alcohol), as it did on the days when he took no alcohol.

III. Wine Leads to Stronger Liquors

Wine is drunk more for its narcotic effect than for the pleasure of its taste. At first this narcotic effect is represented by a feeling of well-being; there is a blunting of self-criticism. The result is the light, gay, unrestrained speech. As time goes on, to get this effect of well-being the habitual drinker has either to increase the amount as his body becomes accustomed to the alcohol, or to resort to stronger liquors. Whisky drinkers are for the most part graduates from the beer and wine class, and disdain going back to it.

The history of beer and wine drinking countries shows that the use of beer and wine not only does not prevent the drinking of stronger liquors but seems to lead to it. France, which has the largest per capita wine consumption in Europe, and Germany and Belgium, which had before the war the largest per capita beer consumption, had the highest per capita consumption of spirits. France did not stop there even, but went on to more destructive drinks, so that after the war broke out, the French government passed a law prohibiting the sale of absinth, an alcoholic liquor containing 60 per cent of alcohol. There had been a growing movement in favor of its prohibition for several years before the war because it was recognized as the cause of much insanity, crime, and loss of health.

There is always the danger that the wine drinker will become dissatisfied with wine and seek the stronger liquors. As France's own physicians have shown, drinkers who come to crave the drug effect of the alcohol in weak wines find they can get it quicker in stronger wines, then in brandy, and finally in absinth. Trying to get the "pleasurable" effect of alcohol they go from the weakest to the strongest drinks.

There are healthful uses of grapes which should be encouraged. Describe the food value of the whole grape and of the grape juice; of the raisin. The grape is naturally a valuable food for man. To turn it into an alcoholic drink not only destroys its food value, but makes it actually dangerous to health and efficiency.

"Wine drinking has always made for drunkenness," says Vance Thompson in "Drink and Be Sober," drawing on personal observation from years of residence in a wine-drinking country. "Alcohol taken in wine breeds the same disease of mind and body that it breeds in its more fiery disguises. And the habit demands stronger doses. In forty years of the old wine-drinking days the consumption of alcohol in France doubled. Your nation is like a man;....the wine habit led straight to stronger ways of drink....Let there be no doubt about it; the wine way to drunkenness is a way like any other. It is not a clean way; if you have followed the trail of the wine-drunkard home faring."

patients now being received are cared for at the Irving Park Boulevard Martha Washington Home. "During the ten years from 1910 to 1919," says Judge Greene in his report, "the average number of patients treated each year was 921. Of these an average of 65 each year had delirium tremens. In 1920, of 125 patients treated, only three had delirium tremens among the men and none among the women. In 1921 there were only two cases of delirium tremens among the men, and none among the women.

"The population of our home is a sure thermometer of prohibition and its enforcement," says Judge Greene. "I have noticed this through the past several years in looking over our monthly reports, and my experience for thirteen years as legal assistant to the chief justice of the Chicago Municipal Court, and before that as assistant state's attorney of Cook County, provided me with a practical basis on which to judge. I can draw only one conclusion from this steady and sharp decline in the number of inebriates, and that is that vastly less liquor is being used today than formerly."

In 1918, the last license year, there were 733 residents; in 1921, there were 171. Judge Greene explains that the small increase of patients in 1921 over 1920 is made up almost exclusively of men over the age of forty years and particularly betwen the ages of fifty and sixty. "I think our experience with 'repeaters' offers proof on this line (that drinking is not so prevalent)" said the judge. "We haven't had any for a month or more, while they used to be always with us. For instance, in 1917 there were 450 admissions for the first time, 150 for the second and 100 for the third time in the year. How greatly the ranks of the inebriates have thinned in the past few years may be further illustrated by our admissions for January, which numbered only eight. Of these, six were alcoholics."

Unanimity Among Social Welfare Workers as to Value of Prohibition

A visit to a half dozen or more social settlements, as many missions, and to Salvation Army Headquarters, impressed the writer with the unanimity of opinion of the social welfare workers as to the desirability of prohibition. The testimony of Miss Jane Addams, head resident of the Hull House, and noted social settlement worker, well voices the sentiments of the men and women who are investing their lives among the people of the poorer and foreign sections of the big municipality.

HOW CAN WOMEN PROMOTE SENTIMENT FOR LAW OBSERVANCE?

LEADING WOMEN OF AMERICA, IN ANSWER TO REQUEST FROM THE UNION SIGNAL, EXPRESS THEIR CONVICTIONS IN REGARD TO OBSERVANCE OF AND RESPECT FOR LAW

RICH AND POOR ALIKE SHOULD BE PUNISHED FOR DISRESPECT TO THE LAW

Zona Gale

It seems to me that the most effective way to impress upon men and women the importance of the observance of law is to demand that observance equally from all classes of society. At present it is perfectly well known that the failure to observe law is often overlooked and excused in the rich and powerful, whereas the poor and friendless are obliged to suffer for their disobedience. When we recognize the connection between jails and poverty—the fact that the majority of prisoners are the poor—we shall be beginning to face this question. When we note further the open violation of law and even of the Constitution by those of power and that these violations often pass unpunished we shall be squarely facing it. We caunot create respect for law in those who now do not respect it when they see it broken with impunity by the powerful while the poor are made to pay the penalty.

I believe that the best way to serve this end is by education, and a step toward it would be the emphasis of this idea by every woman to every group with which she is associated.

OBSERVANCE OF AND RESPECT FOR LAW SHOULD BEGIN IN THE HOME

Marietta B. Wilkins, Ex-President Women's National Missionary Association of Universalist Church

Flagrant violations of the Volstead Act, with open approval of such violations, in many cases, on the part of our citizens, are reaching an alarming stage, and, apart from obvious benefits accruing from the suppression of the liquor traffic, cause us to wonder whether basic principles of our Government itself are not being undermined.

Only recently an attempt was made in a Massachusetts coast city to land a whole ship-load of whisky and gin worth several hundred thousand dollars from a vessel lying a few miles outside its harbor, one of the most daring and gigantic schemes ever known. Subsequently, there was ill-concealed glee on the streets when it was thought that the vessel had escaped the authorities, but gloom followed, for it was apprehended and is now held at our capital city.

Such open violations of our Federal laws should be severely punished and it should be made an offense against society to condone such acts. Such an attitude is little short of treason. A weakness lies right here; violations of law should be frowned upon by everybody. Unconsciously our people ignore the truth that conformity to our laws is essential to peace and prosperity.

Women, who are usually the greater sufferers from broken laws, can do much to raise the standard of public opinion individually by unqualified disapproval of each and every act of this kind, by setting a high standard, first of all in their own homes, unalterably setting themselves against any suggestion of the use or home manufacture of any questionable drink, taking the safest side on all such questions, excluding the use of such things in cookery, etc.

This is not always easy perhaps for the woman unaided by the rest of the family. Is it true, as a recent writer states, that this amendment to the Constitution "strikes at a well-nigh universal taste, at the unbroken habits of centuries, at traditions embalmed in prose and poetry and associated in men's minds with much that is pleasantest in their lives," calling upon us "to change at once the habits of a life time?" If true, then "Pity 'tis, 'tis true."

Especially can women help in their clubs and various organizatious. Massachusetts is one of the four states which have as yet not adopted a state code in harmony with the Federal law, but at a meeting of the Massachusetts Federation of Women's Clubs recently held in Boston, it was unanimously voted that the recommendation for such a code be adopted. Previous measures under consideration had their varying supporters but the resolution on the Volstead Act went through at once with a clear determined "Yes" and no nays; eloquently revealing the woman's mind and heart in that great assembly. The work in organizations is far-reaching for it carries with it many individuals, the hearts of many homes.

Seeing some homes and not altogether poor homes either, one wonders if it be possible to raise up a generation of law-revering people. Obedience in the home, in the school, in the community will carry with it the broader grasp and reverence for the laws of the land. The schools are doing much through their patriotic observances. Communities should insist on the enforcement of all laws and our women are now in a position to see that the laws are enforced.

Influence of Home Life Far-Reaching

There is one remedy which we firmly believe will help in instilling into the minds of young people respect for our laws,—and this again harks back to the mother—that remedy is refusal to condone the petty thieving of young children, stealing of flowers and fruit, a simple and well-known example. Children should be punished for such thefts but if caught, mistaken sympathy oftentimes prevents the enforcement of any adequate punishment; again and yet again this happens until private gardens and fruit trees are taboo in this country. Even Germany could teach us something here. Disrespect for law and for the right of the individual, failure to recognize the principle of "Thine and Mine" begins right here oftentimes; it would be better for us all if examples could be made of such young offenders, who if unpunished, become more dangerous malefactors. This may seem harsh but there is no question in our mind but that so-called "petty thieving" checked, would have a salutary effect. Many of our settlement workers can help materially; many times the settlement worker, believing fully that her love for and interest in the offender will suffice, does more harm than she realizes when she probates these young thieves.

How little is thought of the far-reaching influence of the well-regulated co-operating household, the welfare of one being, the welfare of all; the failure of one, the failure of the whole unit, the rights of each respected.

In the home, yes, the American home, with its consecrated mother at the helm, the principles of law observance, which later can be the basic principles of statesmanship itself, can be engendered and made secure.

Let us begin at the right end; check the tendency to disregard authority in the young and we shall see greater respect for our very laws in the next generatiou.

FAILURE OF LAW ENFORCEMENT MAY BRING COLLAPSE OF GOVERNMENT

Ada Comstock, President American Association of University Women

I believe that failure to enforce the laws of a country, whether due to inability of the governing body or to cynical lack of effort, is so demoralizing to the people that it might easily be the forerunner of the collapse of their form of government. Women could give no better evidence of their value as citizens than by helping to promote a belief in the enforcement of law. They can do it, if they will, by themselves setting an example of scrupulous observance of law; by briuging up their children to respect the law; by influencing the organizations to which they belong to regard legislation as a solemn act, never to be performed lightly or carelessly, and never when accomplished, to be disregarded.

PROHIBITION DOES PROHIBIT

Katherine L. Craig, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Colorado

I have been reading with manifest interest the articles being published upon the subject of prohibition and the crime wave which seems to be sweeping over this broad land of ours.

I quite agree with the ideas advocated that prohibition is not responsible for the lawless tendency of today. In this period of political and educational readjustment, there seems to be a tendency to unrest, such as an unsettled state of affairs produces in the re-establishment of old principles and the organization of new. It seems to be a logical conclusion when we say that crime and lawlessness follow the state of warfare and governmental upheaval. The present condition is not affecting so much the youth of our land as the adults who are loath to accept new conditions.

Boys and girls are inclined to follow in the footsteps of their elders and if we enforce laws preventing crime, and restrain the wave of lawlessness, the child will become a law-abiding citizen.

Law of itself is inactive. The law but the wish of the people and it should be instilled into the minds of the youth of our land that only respect for the law and adherence to it can make us a great people, a great nation, and a successful government.

It is said that prohibition does not prohibit; that it is only a restraining law. While this may be true, it is certainly conclusive in the mind of every well thinking being that it has lent its advantages to the welfare of the people. It takes time to convert the people to the right way of thinking. The best and most substantial method is to introduce in the public school system respect for the prohibition law and all laws. Children should be taught to be law-abiding citizens.

WANTED: A MILLION WOMEN IN THE RANKS OF THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

READ! DECIDE! JOIN!

"The Eighteenth Amendment is the will of a fanatical minority," the effort of "a lot of lunatics to regulate personal liberty," says the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment.

WANTED, a million clear-visioned women who can see through the subterfuges and sophistries of the opponents of prohibition and estimate aright the value of the Eighteenth Amendment to home and society, to join the "right-minded majority" and help enforce and hold the national prohibitory law.

"Let us refuse to become a milk-fed and spineless race," pleads one of the leaders of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment in urging audiences to work for the repeal of the Volstead Code and ultimately the Eighteenth Amendment.

WANTED, a million level-headed women, with the courage of their convictions, to protest against the movement to make the United States an alcohol-fed, brewery controlled nation, and as evidence of their protest, to join the W. C. T. U. and wear the white ribbon.

"Prohibition has been attended with dire economic consequences and an increase in crime," declare the leaders of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment.

WANTED, a million intelligent women to refute this false statement and to proclaim the whole truth about prohibition; to inform the people that the past two years under prohibition have been superlative health years; that savings banks note big increase in deposits, and social welfare and charitable societies report improved conditions as the result of the dry law.

With the slogan, "Light Wines and Beer," the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment proposes to replace the present law with a measure that will permit the sale of these liquors in every cafe, soft drink parlor, drug store and grocery.

WANTED, a million women to unite in opposing, with voice and pen, a scheme that will make accessible to every young man and woman the temptation to drink alcoholic beverages, and to throw their influence for the retention of the Volstead Law.

"The United States has become a by-word among the civilized and free peoples of the world, shunned by visitors from other lands," charged one of the speakers for the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, at a mass meeting in New York.

WANTED, a million women to tell that the peoples of other nations are eagerly looking to the United States for leadership in the anti-alcohol movement, depending upon our demonstration of prohibition to aid them in their campaigns to abolish the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages.

"Enlist residents of your political districts in the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment," advise the promoters of the movement.

WANTED, a million patriotic women to help arouse other women voters to a realization of the vital issue to be decided at the coming primaries and election, and to persuade them to make it a matter of conscience to cast their ballots for candidates who can be depended upon to support the Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Code.

Let the home loving women of this country, each in her place—in the family circle, in the school room, in the office, in the club, in the church—unitedly work and pray and vote for the enforcement and continuance of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code!

Word has just been received at the national headquarters of the passing to the Home beyond of Mrs. J. K. Barney, World's W. C. T. U. organizer, and honorary president of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U. White ribboners in all parts of the country will feel a personal grief in the loss of this pioneer worker. Grateful mention of her labors of love during her long life will be made later.

Law Enforcement Resolution In Order

The adoption by the Young Women's Christian Association, at its national convention, of a strong resolution for the strict enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, sets the pace for other influential bodies which are soon to meet. There is not the slightest doubt that the preponderance of sentiment in the United States is strongly in favor of strict enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. If this sentiment is given expression in resolutions passed by assemblies, conventions, mass meetings and conferences, it will put new courage into the hearts of officials who are heroically endeavoring to enforce the law, and will serve notice upon violators of the Eighteenth Amendment that the people are insisting that justice be meted out to them.

If Forty-Eight Governors Were To Do It

A proclamation was issued by Governor William D. Denney of Delaware, in which he urged his people to rally to the observance of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law, and asked that the week from April 23 to April 29 be specially observed as Law Enforcement week, with appropriate services and exercises to be held in churches, schools and public buildings.

What the governor of Delaware has had the wisdom and courage to do, the chief executive of every commonwealth ought to do. If these men of privilege and authority were to take similar action and appeal to the citizens of their states to "concentrate their best, spiritually and materially, to encourage and assist those whose duty it is to enforce the law" it would give an impetus to the observance of all law that would send the bootleggers, hootch makers, moonshiners, and other violators into oblivion.

Perhaps all your governor needs to spur him to action is a suggestion from the law-abiding men and women who elected him to office.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922

Jogging The Voters' Memories!

If the voters of Indiana fail to vote right at the primaries—which, by the way, will have occurred before this issue of THE SIGNAL is in the mails—they will have sinned against light. The Indiana W. C. T. U. is doing its level best—and the Hoosier state's best is of a superlatively fine quality—to enlighten men and women citizens on the big issue of wet and dry candidates. They are heading the little dodgers with which they are literally sowing the state, with the words, "Work and Vote for Dry Candidates," and are following that appeal with some mighty interesting "before and after" facts and figures that ought to give voters long, long thoughts on casting a ballot for the nomination of any candidate who isn't four square for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code. Their statistics are taken from the records and reports of the board of state charities, and show such interesting facts as these: 39 per cent reduction under prohibition of admissions to county jails; 64.8 per cent reduction since prohibition of persons committed to all penal institutions for adults; reduction of children of drunken parents brought before the Juvenile court from 619 in 1917 (last wet year) to 8 in 1921; reduction of inmates of women's prisons from 226 in 1917 to 99 in 1921.

They offer this sage advice: "Don't let the propagandists tell you, or others, that prohibition is a failure. Here are some facts. Think them over. Think of changed conditions near your home. Look around you. Remember that any step backwards helps to bring back the corner saloon."

This is the kind of literature that ought to keep the thinking machines of good Americans working overtime, until they have come to the commonsense conclusion that it is "up to them" to get busy and make sure that not only they themselves but their neighbors, business associates and friends are not fooled into nullifying or hampering a law that is one of the finest economic and social assets the nation possesses.

A suggestion to the sagacious is all-sufficient. May every state distribute at its primaries as good literature as that receiving wide circulation in Indiana.

Paying the Price

"Do you know," said the club woman, rather soberly, "I was one woman who never wanted the vote. I used to think I would rather not have anything to do with choosing those who should control city, state and nation. I believed I already had enough to do, and—well, I know it was a selfish reason, but I did not want the responsibility."

"How, then, did you come to change your opinion?" asked her friend. "I know how earnestly you have worked since women got the vote, and what an influence you have in civic affairs, as well as in church work. You surely are now taking that responsibility very much to heart."

The club woman smiled over at her husband. "My husband converted me," she explained. "Many is the hour he has spent impressing upon me the fact that a woman has just as much responsibility as her husband for the welfare of her town, and has the same inherent right as he to say who shall fill public positions."

The professor nodded. "Yes, I always believed that there were some tangles in our public affairs that the women would straighten out if once they had the opportunity. Very often, the men are busier than their wives, because they have to earn the living, and when the day is done they are too weary to know who has been elected, or how well the public official is carrying out his election promises. The men want good to be paramount, but they often don't see how they can take the time to eliminate the crookedness which exists in politics. What the women had already accomplished, however, long before they had the vote, showed not only that they were interested in public affairs and that they had the keenness to see what should be done, but also that they had the will and the faith to see that it was done. And I believe that city, state, and national affairs will be far better because the man and the woman go together to the polls to cast their ballots."

"So,"—and the caller turned again to her hostess—"when you once had come to the conclusion that you had a duty as regards civic affairs, you went to work with all your might. I wish some other folk were as thoroughly convinced that even to vote is not all there is of civic duty."

"Well, you see," replied the other slowly and thoughtfully, "I have come to realize that a Christian woman cannot pray, 'Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done,' unless she is willing to throw her whole strength into helping to answer that prayer. The trouble is, we want things to be all right, but we are unwilling to pay the price."

"Unwilling to pay the price!" The phrase stayed with the caller as she took her leave. It came to her again and again during the rest of the day and evening. It appeared on the pages of the book she was reading and re-echoed in the watches of the night. Did it not answer the question of why wrong so often prevails all over the world? What would have become of civilization had not Paul, Martin Luther, Savonarola, Joan of Arc, Frances E. Willard, or the Master Himself been willing to pay the price?

PITHY PROHIBITION PARAGRAPHS

1,300 GALLONS OF ALCOHOL PER 1,000 OF POPULATION CONSUMED IN ENGLAND TO 41 GALLONS PER 1,000 IN THE UNITED STATES during the year 1921 is the result of the analysis, by the Manchester Guardian, of G. B. Wilson's annual report of the British national drink bill.

BARLEY, FORMERLY USED FOR BREWING PURPOSES, IS COMING ON THE MARKET IN INCREASING AMOUNTS AS A HOG FEED, is the word from the United States Department of Agriculture, which has taken up the problem of finding out the relative feeding value of light and heavy barley. The hog industry has been moving into the barley producing districts since use of the grain for brewing purposes has fallen off.

EX-CONGRESSMAN CHARLES RANDALL ADVISES PROSPECTIVE BOOTLEGGERS AND MOONSHINERS OF CALIFORNIA TO CONSIDER THEIR PROBABLE FATE before entering the game, and says that if ever they get caught in the meshes of United States Federal Judge Bledsoe's court, they may look for a heavy penalty. The mills of justice grind exceedingly fine, and at a recent Monday's grist not a single culprit escaped jail sentence of from sixty days to six months. Oh, yes, one did—a young man who pleaded that he was out of work, his wife was an expectant mother, and he needed money. After his arrest he had secured an honest job and had already been promoted. Would the judge let him off with a fine? Yes, the judge would. He said, "Young man, your bond of $2,000 will remain up, while you pay a fine of $750, in installments during one year." Here is a 100 per cent American judge who believes that respect for the law is the only cure for lawlessness.

PROHIBITION ABOVE PARTY will be the slogan of members of the New Jersey Methodist conference when they go to the polls next November, and they will at that time support the candidate who is consistently dry, be he a Republican or a Democrat.

"THE OLD POODLE DOG" of SAN FRANCISCO HAS SUCCUMBED TO THE RIGORS OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION. This famous restaurant whose "bark had its sails furled when the Volstead act came to scuttle every vessel hitherto impervious to water," according to the San Francisco Examiner, in closing its doors has gone the way of other famous local eating places such as Jules', said now to be a dairy lunch; Techau's Tavern, soon to be a candy store, the Odeon and Portola-Louvre, which have been changed into cafeterias.

MEN ARE NOT SO GENEROUS WITH THEIR WOMEN FOLKS WHEN THEY ARE SOBER AS WHEN INTOXICATED is the contention of Lucille (Lady Duff Gordon), well known modiste, who has just gone into bankruptcy and attributes her failure to prohibition. It would seem that formerly friend husband's liberality took the form of a peace offering after a night's debauch, and that at least a part of this "hush money" eventually found its way into the coffers of fashionable makers of gowns. "Accounts at Lucille's run all the way from $10,000 to $75,000 a year," says the Los Angeles (Cal.) Express, "and a man must be very drunk, or very rich, to let 'his women folk' doll up to this extent. Sad, isn't it, that Mr. Volstead has curtailed the adornment of 'the women folk' of the rich broker, the smart speculator and the man about town!" But the woman who now has the money that usually rested in the till of the corner saloon when her husband was under the influence of liquor, is not finding fault with her husband's lack of generosity now that he is habitually sober. "She is thanking God that at last, as a hard working, self-sacrificing wife and mother, she is getting what in strict justice is her due."

THAT THE "BOOTLEGGERS' BLUE BOOK," reported by the San Francisco Call to have been found in the offices of the Central California Vineyard Association, may become a "Doomsday Book" for those whose names appear as buyers of liquor, is indicated by the announcement of the state prohibition director that "Persons conspiring with bootleggers to purchase liquor are liable the same as the sellers."

BEAUTY PARLORS THRIVE UNDER PROHIBITION. Such is said to be the impression of some of their owners, who offer the explanation that since former drinking men now sit at home evenings clear-eyed and clear-headed they are more critical than in the old days when, under the influence of alcohol, they saw everything through a rosy glow, more properly, a mist. As a result the women are flocking to beauty parlors.

RESPECTABLE CLUBS HAVE NOT SUFFERED THROUGH THE BARRING OF THE SOCIAL GLASS, at least one club hasn't. We are told by the Oakland (Cal.) Tribune that "the Union League announces the completion of plans and arrangements to build a new club house to cost a quarter of a million dollars. The structure is to be seven stories high, and will contain some ninety lodgings."

"WOULD A LIGHT WINE AMENDMENT BENEFIT THE GRAPE BUSINESS?" is a question which was recently asked of Mrs. Fern McPherson, of Lawton, Michigan, manager of the largest fruit association in the state, according to the Kalamazoo (Mich.) Gazette. "I do not really know," she replied, "but I would vote against it anyway. The grape business, the same as any other, is going to depend on general prosperity, which will certainly be promoted more by prohibition than by the liquor traffic. The demand for bulk grapes is decreasing, and we must depend on table grapes well packed and of good quality to supply the demand."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Time For Prayer

When is the time for prayer?
With the first beams that light the morning sky,
Ere for the toils of day thou dost prepare,
Lift up thy thoughts on high;
Commend thy loved ones to His watchful care;
Morn is the time for prayer.

And in the noontide hour,
If worn by toil, or by sad cares oppressed,
Then unto God, thy spirit's sorrow pour,
And He will give thee rest;
Thy voice shall reach Him through the fields of air:
Noon is the time for prayer.

When the bright sun hath set,
While eve's bright colors deck the skies;
When with the loved at home thou'st met,
Then let thy prayers arise
For those who in thy joys and sorrows share,
Eve is the time for prayer.

And when the stars come forth—
When to the trusting heart sweet hopes are given,
And the deep stillness of the hour gives birth
To pure bright dreams of heaven,
Kneel to thy God—ask strength, life's ills to bear,
Night is the time for prayer.

When is the time for prayer?
In every hour, while life is spared to thee;
In crowds or solitude, in joy or care,
Thy thoughts should heavenward flee.
At home, at morn and eve, with loved ones there,
Bend thou the knee in prayer!

You can spare a dollar. It is the dollar you can't spare which bears the hallmark of Calvary and is the minister of redemptive life. It is when our giving, whether of money, of strength, or time, touches the quick that it becomes vital, and existence passes into life, and we share the travail of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.—Rev. RED LETTER DAYS

May 8-14—Membership Week.
May 14—Mothers' Day.

Michigan Holds Interesting, Inspirational Institute

Myrta E. Lockwood, Recording Secretary

From the first call to order by Mrs. E. L. Calkins, state president, until the last goodbye was said, the institute held in Detroit spelled i-n-s-p-i-r-a-t-i-o-n. Eleven members of the state executive were present at the opening session, the previous day having been spent in executive board meetings at state headquarters.

Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, national director of Women in Industry, won her listeners as she discussed the "Millionaire Program." Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director of Americanization, captivated her audience when she presented W. C. T. U. plans and urged "Conferences and Conversations" on the burning vital question, "How Does Prohibition Work in the United States?" and showed how the Jubilee Fund has made it possible to meet world needs.

A. C. Graham, field secretary of the Anti-Saloon League, and F. P. Leckliter, superintendent of the Detroit district of the A. S. L., brought words of encouragement and cheer as they declared: "Legalized beverage has gone and the Eighteenth Amendment will not be repealed," and urged intelligent citizenship, emphasizing the fact that "woman holds in her hand the balance of power." Her business, then, is to become familiar with the issues.

It was a happy privilege to present the mother of Prohibition Commissioner Roy Haynes—a guest from the home of Mother Thompson—who declared she "was glad, through her son, to contribute to the cause of right." The fragrance of the appreciation of Michigan white ribboners was carried to her in a beautiful bouquet of roses.

Plans were presented for a membership drive, and essay contest plans outlined.

Evening addresses were given by Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Vayhinger, and a great day was over. Three wonderful sessions—with workable plans suggested—and Mrs. Miller declared, "I did not hear one 'I can't' all day." Michigan W. C. T. U. members do not say "I can't." We are sounding the three triumphant notes, "I wish"—"I can"—"I will," and, as we go forward, we are singing to the tune of "Old Black Joe":

"Gone the saloon, with all its sin and shame,
Gone beer and wine from Oregon to Maine;
Gone Demon Rum, our Nation's greatest foe,
And we will fight with all our might
To keep it so.
Chorus
"We love her—we love her,
The state of Michigan,
God helping us, we'll see it through
In Michigan."

Stickers

If the efforts of reformers are to be successful, their work must not be done spasmodically in the enthusiasm of the moment. The destructive forces are working twenty-four hours per day, three hundred and sixty-five days per annum. The reformers must become "stickers" to their job. The committee for the World's W. C. T. U. convention have discovered a method by which every temperance worker may become a twenty-four hour worker for the cause. Just enclose $3.00 for a thousand or 50 cents for a hundred and say "Stickers," to 1.

Come, ye loyal people, come and take your stand
In the fight for temperance over all our land!
Come armed with the ballot, come with flags unfurled,
Stand and "show your colors" proudly to the world!
CHORUS
Stand for law and order, stand for God and right,
Stand for home and country in this noble fight!

Traitors to our country we will never be—
We uphold together law's supremacy.
Rum, the dire invader, from our land must go—
Then shall peace and plenty in our borders grow!

God of Hosts be with us! Right shall e'er prevail!
May the powers of darkness in Thy presence quail!
Give us strength and courage as we march along,
Grant to us the victory over sin and wrong!
CHORUS
Thine shall be the glory! Upheld by Thy might
We shall win the victory in this noble fight!

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

YOUTH SAVED MEANS MANHOOD MADE STRONG

Maude B. Perkins, National Secretary Young People's Branch

Twelve weeks of field activities in the great northwest, most of which have been at conferences, convince me that our work for young people is the most important endeavor of the W. C. T. U. today. No better investment of our lives can be made or will bring better returns. There are many who could lead but are afraid to try it. Surely those of us who have traveled a few more years over the road of life can supplement their education by our own gained through experience, and thus steer them over some of the hard places. Y. P. B. effort is an investment in humanity. The future of the W. C. T. U. depends upon our concerted service with and for young people, at this critical time.

There are many Sunday school classes with members of the W. C. T. U. as teachers, and our program, as worked out, would provide for them an excellent avenue of service, linking up these earnest young people with our splendid social service work. Present conditions prove that the Y. P. B. is more greatly needed now than ever before.

In one large high school we found a Girls' Cigaret Club. In other high schools, students were debating, "Resolved, that the Eighteenth Amendment should be repealed." Law enforcement officials tell me that one of the places where the bootlegger is most frequently to be found is near the college campus. In one school the boys used liquor brewed at home and became so intoxicated that the teacher was obliged to call for help.

These things compel us to believe that our pledge-signing campaigns are needed and that the Y. P. B. is today the finest of organizations for our young men and women. No union is doing all that it should if it is failing to enlist the young people in its ranks.

In one conference the Federal prohibition officer said, "When I go to your W. C. T. U. meetings I am always impressed with the courage and nobility of the gray-haired women who are working with us for the enforcement of our law, but you need more young women in your ranks. Where are they?"

5,000 New Members, 500 New Branches and 500,000 Signatures to the Polyglot Petition!

As we pursue our work in our Million Members campaign, let us enlist at least one young woman for every middle-aged woman, and let us give her some definite work to do.

The men and women who are to be the statesmen, educators, lawyers and leaders of tomorrow are the boys and girls growing up in your town today, and it is your duty to reach them NOW. Convictions worked into their lives in these formative days will make of them in the future ideal citizens.

It is said that when John Wesley was a small boy a man risked his life by rushing into a burning building to save him. In this way he was instrumental in giving to the world Methodism. What boy or girl in your town are you working to save? Perhaps some youth whose life you may save from sin and sorrow is destined to be America's greatest citizen. Is it not worth while to at least make the investment of time and effort?

Getting It Straight From the Psychopathic Expert at Michigan University

"Let us admit that the case of The People vs. Alcohol has not been settled," said Keene Sumner in an interview with Doctor Albert M. Barrett, head of the State Psychopathic Hospital of the University of Michigan, as reported in the American Magazine. "Drinking is still going on. Every man claims, of course, that the liquor he drinks is 'good liquor,' although a long array of obituary notices proves that a lot of people have been fooled on that point. Assuming that a man drinks only what he calls good liquor, what are the effects?"

"Any discussion of the subject," said Doctor Barrett, "must begin with the primary fact that alcohol is a poison. The very word 'intoxication' is a recognition of this fact."

"Then a confirmed drinker is really a poison addict," said the interviewer.

"Well, that's a novel way of putting it," was the reply, "but I guess it is accurate. Yes, I suppose it is literally true. There is, of course, a wide difference among individuals in their susceptibility to alcohol. One person reacts violently to a very small quantity. Another person can take an extraordinary amount without apparent effect. But even in the latter case, the absence of effect may be only apparent. The man who boasts that he can take any amount of liquor without feeling it, is thinking of the superficial symptoms of intoxication. Even though he exhibits none of these symptoms, the insidious process of poisoning may be going on in his system, nevertheless."

Crown of American Sovereignty Is the Ballot

In a message to Christian Endeavorers, sent out by radio, Dr. Daniel A. Poling, associate president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, says, "Someone has described America as a republic in which all men are sovereigns, but in which no man cares to wear a crown. The crown of American sovereignty is the ballot, and every citizen otherwise worthy who fails to wear his crown denies his kingship and endangers his kingdom. The only man who throws away his vote is the man who does not vote at all, or who, voting, votes against his convictions for some venal consideration. I may never vote with the majority; but if my vote expresses my political judgment, delivers my own soul as a citizen, it wins."

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, President Emeritus of Harvard University, Urges Enforcement of Eighteenth Amendment

"During the past year evidence has accumulated on every hand that prohibition has promoted all over the country public health, public happiness and industrial efficiency," declared Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, in a communication read at a recent hearing of the legislative committee on legal affairs in the State House, Boston. "This evidence comes from manufacturers, physicians, nurses of all sorts, school, factory, hospital and district, and from social workers of many races and religions, laboring daily in a great variety of fields. This testimony also demonstrates beyond a doubt that prohibition is actually sapping the terrible force of disease, poverty, crime and vice. These results are obtained in spite of the imperfect enforcement in some communities of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution."

When Ulysses Grant Became an Abstainer

Last month we celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of General Ulysses S. Grant. Of special interest, therefore, is the story related by Andrew Carnegie, in his autobiography. "During the trials of the war in the west," writes Mr. Carnegie, "General Grant began to indulge too freely in liquor. The chief of the staff, Rawlins, boldly ventured to tell him so. That this was the act of a true friend Grant fully recognized. 'You do not mean that? I was wholly unconscious of it. I am surprised,' said the general. 'Yes, I do mean it. It is even beginning to be a subject of comment among your officers.' 'Why did you not tell me before? I'll never drink a drop of liquor again,' said General Grant." Mr. Carnegie adds, "He never did. Time after time in later years, dining with the Grants in New York, I have seen the General turn down the wine glasses at his side. That indomitable will of his enabled him to remain steadfast to his resolution."

Patron of Bootlegger Partner of Criminal

"Speaking in a general way, the partner to a crime is one who participates in the profits or benefits of the crime, though he does not actually commit the deed," says M. Ashby Jones, D. D., in the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution. "For this reason he does not run the same risk of detection nor is he liable to as severe punishment. And yet quite often he is the instigator, the tempter, or at least the inspiration of the crime.....Therefore, we must face the truth, that the partner to the crime is a more dangerous enemy to society than the criminal, and that it is impossible to decrease or stop crime, unless you can in some effective way reach the source.

"I can think of no better illustration of the principles I am trying to state than the 'bootlegger,' his backers and his patrons. Of course in this dramatis personae the bootlegger is the criminal, while those who finance him and those who buy from him are both particeps criminis. Or in terms of the English language, they are the partners of the criminal. And no matter how harsh it may sound, those who buy intoxicating liquors anywhere in the United States today must face the moral indictment that they are the primary source of all crimes traceable to the bootlegging business. Next in this chain of moral responsibility come those who furnish the money to finance this nefarious business.

"Leaving out for the moment all consideration of the deleterious effects of the drinking of intoxicating liquors, let any thoughtful man face the vicious effects of this illegal business upon our social and political life and he must see that free government and civil order itself is being put in jeopardy. This business calls for men of the most desperate temperament, who care nothing for the sacredness of law, the preservation of social order or the safety of life.

An Indictment

"It would be difficult to exaggerate the baneful influence of this illegal traffic upon the general morale of our people. Lawlessness is a spirit—an attitude toward organized society. Democratic civilization can never be builded upon force. It depends for its highest success upon an enlightened and self-controlled citizenship. Having created a government and delegated to it authority, such a citizenship recognizes that within the care of that governmental authority are entrusted the precious possessions of its safety and freedom. So the authority of democratic government depends for its final force upon the respect and loyalty of its citizens. It is this respect for and loyalty to our own government which this bootlegging business is rapidly destroying. Courts and police are feeling this pernicious influence. We are making a huge joke of our government and the world is joining in the laughter.

"Therefore, we are forced to indict the bootlegger as the most dangerous criminal of modern times. But the moment we have done this, a clear-sighted honesty will compel us to indict his patrons as particeps criminis.

Lack of Moral Imagination

"It is the lack of moral sensibility or lack of imagination which renders our people today blind to the cost of their social parties. If the average citizen would pause as he lifts his glass to his lips, and ask how that liquor came to him, I have faith enough in the moral integrity of our people to believe he would never drink it. He is a partner of criminals, who run over women and children, as their liquor cars dash over the highways from seacoast or mountains, to fulfill his demands. He is a partner of murderers who kill sheriffs and police when they attempt to stop them in their illegal acts. He is a partner of those who make a mockery of good government, and is helping to sow broadcast in this country the seed of anarchy."

Federal Judge Holds Beer Is Intoxicating

When the anti-beer bill was passed by Congress the liquor interests immediately took it to court with the claim that it was unconstitutional. They chose their own courts, one in St. Louis, one in Brooklyn and one in New York. In every instance the judges have ruled against them.

Judge Farris of the United States District court of St. Louis, in his opinion said, as quoted by the press:

"Courts take judicial notice that beer of the sort here involved is intoxicating liquor, but they do not judicially notice whether beer is or is not valuable as a therapeutic agent. It follows, then, that for the present purposes of this case, beer which complainant desires to make and sell without any interference from the defendants, must be regarded as an intoxicating liquor which possesses no medicinal value whatever. In other words, since the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, the privilege of drinking beer is no longer to be governed by the state of mind of him who drinks it, for since it is an intoxicating liquor its use is forbidden by the Eighteenth Amendment and such use may be forbidden by law passed by Congress, under the power conferred by that Amendment.

"The Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act both forbid the use of beer as a beverage. The amendment to the Volstead Act, now before me, forbids its use as a medicine. When used as a drink it necessarily follows that it is so used either as a beverage or as a medicine. If it has no value as a medicine then when it is used as a drink it is used as a beverage, and this the Eighteenth Amendment, and the laws passed thereunder, forbid.

"Since the end sought, as Congress has thus solemnly determined, is the prohibition of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, no one, I apprehend, can well contend that the Amendment of November 23, 1921, is not appropriate legislation to the end sought. Color is lent to the appropriateness of the restriction here complained of by the fact that a large number of the states of the Union have deemed it absolutely necessary to pass laws which will prohibit the prescribing for medicinal purposes of any intoxicating liquors whatever, save alcohol alone.

"If so it be that the power conferred upon Congress by the Eighteenth Amendment had the effect to narrow or impinge upon, or wholly wipe out Constitutional rights and guarantees heretofore deemed vested and inviolable, the provision may be regrettable, but it cannot be helped. The Constitution when amended must be construed as a whole. If later amendments destroy, impinge upon, modify or wipe out old provisions the newer provisions must stand, because they are the last utterance of the people who reserve to themselves the right to change the organic law in the way provided by the organic law itself. So it is to my mind, utterly futile to urge that the Eighteenth Amendment cannot stand for what it fairly and obviously means, if such construction shall be in effect to change, modify or impinge upon or in fact destroy old provisions and guaranties. In such case, and in the face of obvious conflicts, I repeat, the old provisions must yield and the newer provisions must stand. Any other view would, in effect, be tantamount to saying that the Constitution cannot be amended at all."

Enforcement of Prohibition

W. J. Bryan in The Commoner

Acquiescence in the will of the majority when expressed in accordance with our Constitution and our laws is the vital principle of our government. Jefferson said that acquiescence in the will of the people was the vital principle of the republic from which there is no appeal except to force, the principle of despotism.

That acquiescence in the will of the majority is the recognized policy of this country can be proven by innumerable facts in our history. For instance, in 1876 the Democrats acquiesced in the election of a Republican President by a majority of one in the electoral college when that one majority was secured by a decision of the electoral commission which voted eight to seven on every important question. In 1884 the Republicans acquiesced in the decision when Cleveland was elected by the vote of New York and the vote of New York turned upon a few hundred votes. In 1916 the Republicans again acquiesced in the decision when President Wilson was re-elected by a small majority in the electoral college and that majority came from California which went Democratic by a few votes.

Here we have three instances of acquiescence in the election of Presidents by a narrow margin. Although great interests were at stake there was no suggestion of resistance to the decree rendered according to the Constitution and laws. And yet, we find a large element, made up of some who claim respectability, resisting a prohibition law based upon a Constitutional Amendment adopted by a large majority after a fight of fifty years. No important question has ever been settled by so decisive a majority as that recorded in favor of prohibition. More than two-thirds of the states in the Union went dry by their individual act. More than two-thirds of the members of the Senate and House voted to submit prohibition. Forty-six states out of forty-eight have ratified prohibition. Only two states, Connecticut and Rhode Island, have refused to ratify and they are small states and in the larger of these one branch of the legislature favored ratification. Two congresses have been elected since national prohibition was submitted—one since prohibition went into effect—and both of these congresses have been dry by more than two-thirds majority.

And yet, instead of acquiescing in the will of the majority, the wets in city, state, and nation are attempting to elect to office men pledged to violate their oath. They are trying to prevent the enforcement of the law and also trying to secure legislation which they know to be a violation of the prohibition Amendment.

So bold are these enemies of government that they insolently warn the Federal Government not to interfere with open conspiracies in neighboring nations and on the high seas. A Philadelphia paper recently insisted that the Federal Government should not interfere with rum-runners outside the three mile limit. What a doctrine to preach in this enlightened age! The geographies teach us that three-fourths of the earth's surface is covered by water. The wets would confine civilization to one-quarter and turn over three-quarters of the earth's surface to those who are outlaws and who are engaged in conspiracies against governments.

Whenever a ship puts the black flag above the flag of any nation it can be sunk without fear of war. No civilized nation will lend its flag to the violation of the law of any other nation and it will not protect its citizens when they disgrace their country and their country's flag by such kinds of piracy.

"Freedom of the seas" in this case will be "freedom to seize;" the nations that attempt to protect their homes from the invasion of alcohol will be prepared to seize those who attempt to use the seas for unlawful purposes.

Drinking of Bootleg Whisky Suicidal

The National Vaccine and Antitoxin Institute of Washington recently sought to analyze a number of samples of bootleg dope. "Three of them contained wood alcohol," says the Upper Sandusky (Ohio) Union. "One, branded to be genuine old Kentucky, had bay rum in addition to the wood alcohol, and a heavy trace of fusel oil. Another bearing the label of an old brand of whisky even had traces of formaldehyde in it, as the test disclosed. It is thought this was used to preserve the color and prevent settling sediment to form. Practically all had heavy traces of fusel oil, which when taken into the body causes such a reactive effect as to result in speedy decay, especially attacking the nervous system. .....It's a mighty big risk for anyone to take a drink of the poisonous stuff that is being bootlegged around these days."

Prohibition Adds to Business of Candy Dealers

The demand for sweets, which was one of the first noticeable effects of prohibition, continues to grow. Men who, in the days of the open saloon, never entered a confectioner's, now buy candy and salted peanuts. Chocolate candy is said to be a favorite. The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and the wedding takes place. After a long railroad journey they arrive at Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly.)

CHAPTER XIII.

"I have a second cousin living in Seraneb," announced Mr. Mortimer. "I wonder if you have met her."

"What is her name?"

"She is a medical missionary—Dr. Kathleen Scott, of the Zenana Mission."

"Yes, I have seen her several times at Colonel Green's; she is a friend of his wife's, but she does not go out much."

"She called on me, but I was away, and she was out when I returned the call," said Angela.

"She is a striking looking girl, and, I hear, a very able doctor. The Mission Hospital is said to be very well appointed, thanks to her generosity. I believe she gives a good deal out of her own pocket for its upkeep," said Fortescue.

"She has a nice little income from her mother," said Mortimer. "When quite a little child, she declared her intention of going to India and she has carried it out."

"Let us all go and see her," said his wife.

That morning they drove to the hospital. They were ushered into a sitting-room by a native nurse who said Dr. Scott was busy, but would be at liberty in ten minutes.

They waited in the exquisitely clean room, scented by violets, which were growing in pots, on a jardiniere beside the glass doors.

Dr. Kathleen Scott soon appeared in her spotless white dress and cap, looking the incarnation of vigorous, useful womanhood. She seemed delighted at the unexpected visit of Mr. Mortimer.

"It is just sweet of you to look me up, dear Cousin Robert! It is years since I saw you, but 'Auld Lang Syne' is very dear to me!"

"I guess I should not leave Seraneb without seeing you, Kathleen; we only arrived three days ago. You have not met my wife, and her daughter, Mrs. Fortescue."

She smiled at Angela. "Yes, I've seen her driving, but we missed each other in our calls"; then turning to Mrs. Mortimer, she said, "It is very nice to have you for a cousin. Cousin Robert has waited long for a wife: how happy he must be with you!"

"You've hit the nail on the head, Kathleen; we are just supremely happy," and he cast an adoring look at his wife.

"We want you to make a friend of Angela," said Mrs. Mortimer, intent on the thought that here was a strong, reliable woman, a very friend in need for her young, delicate daughter.

Angela laughed. "Dr. Scott is too busy to come and see me often."

"Yes I am, but you can come and see me, can't you?"

"Oh! I should love to!"

"Would you and Mrs. Mortimer like to see my hospital now?"

"Yes, if you can spare the time."

"Here is a book, Cousin Robert, to occupy your time while we are away. This is a Zenana Hospital, and those of the sterner sex are rigidly excluded."

Many were the sights which greeted mother and daughter; many the tales of alleviated suffering told by dark-skinned convalescent patients. The Miss Doctor Sahib was evidently adored by the staff and patients alike.

"And do you perform all the operations yourself?"

"Yes; on an average I have four critical operations every week, summer and winter, but I have an excellent English trained nurse; all the rest have been trained in this country, but most are reliable. So you see I am well assisted."

Angela was filled with admiration. She scanned the fine face lit up with such interest in her noble work. "She is the handsomest woman I have seen since I came to India," she said to herself. The oval face with its slightly aquiline nose and straight, dark brows, and the mobile, sensitive mouth, and rather prominent chin, gave an impression of sweetness and strength, very rare. Evidently of good birth and breeding, authority was in every gesture; this inspired respect without repelling. Though an American, she had gone to England for her medical course, judging an English degree to be more acceptable in a British dependency, and had taken an M.B. of London, with distinction. She had been four years in India, most of the time in Seraneb, and she was now about twenty-eight years of age.

"I don't think we shall see anything more interesting in the whole of India. What a lovely work it is! To help the suffering Indian women, body and soul, seems to me one of the noblest works on earth. If I could begin life again, I would train for this work," said Mrs. Mortimer.

When they reached home, Angela described to her husband the whole interesting visit, and said, "I shall go often and see Dr. Scott. I like her awfully."

"Go to the hospital, child! What do you mean?"

"Just what I say."

"Indeed you won't go; go and pick up all kinds of diseases, indeed? I object strongly."

"Frank, how absurd! It is an exquisitely clean place."

"Well, you are not to go. Ask Dr. Scott to come here instead."

"She is too busy. Frank, let me go; I want her for a friend."

"Plenty of friends are available without your running after this Mission woman."

Angela was silent. What was the use of entreaty? She knew by experience her husband's arbitrariness. She communicated this decision to her mother who was grieved, but thought it best to say no more.

The Cure

Jennie N. Standifer

"How long have you been keeping a boarding house?" I asked my pleasant-faced landlady.

"Fifteen years, my dear. For ten years I have been in S——. It is not as monotonous a business as you may think. Many interesting life-incidents enliven the work. I've just had a letter from —— but I'll not tire you with stories."

"I'd like to hear one," I insisted.

"Then, I'll tell you the preface of this letter. I had not been living here long when pretty, capable Edna Howard, a young stenographer, came to board with me. She worked for the Louisiana Lumber Company. There were several employes of the firm in the office, but Clarence Cottrell was the head. I soon saw that Edna was deeply in love with his young man. He called to see her often, but never took her out in the evenings. She soon confided to me that Mr. Cottrell had asked her to marry him, but he did not think his salary sufficient to support a wife and they would wait for an increase.

"'I have heard that the young man is dissipated,' I ventured to say. 'Perhaps it would be better to wait several years.'

"'He has vowed he will never touch another drop of liquor as long as he lives,' she assured me confidently.

"Saloons still existed in our town and I had my doubts as to whether the young man would keep that vow. My surmise proved correct. There were times during the following winter when the worried look on Edna's face told of her lover's failure to keep his promise, but sometime in the spring she told me that his salary had been raised and they would marry early in June. She asked my advice in selecting her simple trousseau.

"'Wait until Mr. Cottrell has saved something ahead,' I urged.

"'No,' was the decided reply, 'He needs me, and I want a home, even though it is only rented. My parents died when I was a child, and I have never had a real one with my uncle and aunt. I must go out to see them Sunday and tell them of my approaching marriage, and how happy I am.'

"Her uncle lived on a farm twelve miles north of here. Edna received permission from her employer to remain several days. While she was away Cottrell went on a spree which was freely discussed by my boarders. Some of them were sure she would break her engagement.

"'No,' said young Dr. Hendrix, who admired Edna immensely, 'she is infatuated with an ideal hero who does not exist. She is blind to Cottrell's faults, and must have a cure of some sort before her eyes are opened, or she will listen to reason.'

"Edna soon heard of Cottrell's 'misfortune' as she called it, and hastened to explain that he had been over-persuaded by drinking friends. 'He says I can reform him, for when he is with me he never has a desire to drink,' she explained.

"Nothing I could say changed her determination to marry him. She began work on her wedding clothes, sewing late into the night, and having only a few best gowns made by a professional dressmaker. She was to give up her position as stenographer the first of June and be married at her uncle's the following week. On the Sunday morning before the first of the month, Cottrell phoned that he had been called out of town but would be back Monday afternoon. He had not returned by Tuesday evening and Edna was almost frantic. She kept saying over and over: "'He has met with an accident or there has been foul play.'

"She was sitting on the porch with me late that evening when a wild-eyed, disheveled man came rushing up the steps, and fairly shrieked:

"'I've been fired. I have no work, and we can't marry, Edna!'

"It was Clarence Cottrell, and I expected Edna to turn from him in disgust. But the loss of his position seemed to call out her tenderest sympathy. I left them on the porch. She was speaking words of encouragement, and promising to wait for him until he found other work, no matter how many years it might be. I was relieved that the marriage was postponed. Later, I learned that Cottrell had been drunk and by his negligence had caused the lumber company to lose many thousands of dollars.

"Edna went back to her uncle's and young Cottrell drifted west.

"Ten years passed. The saloon was voted out of our state and then came prohibition. I heard from a mutual friend that Edna had become a trained nurse, and during the world war had gone to France. I had not heard of her return, but one day last summer she knocked at my door and asked for board.

"'I've been sent from the city,' she explained, 'to be night nurse for a woman living in the suburbs of your town, and I prefer to board with you and go to my work on the street car at six in the evening.'

"I was glad to have her, and pleased to see that she had grown handsomer and had acquired self-confidence and dignity. Before she had been with me an hour she told me that she had met Cottrell in France and their engagement had been renewed. He had inherited a fine legacy from an aunt and he was able to go into business for himself, and they would be married quite soon. He was then off in the country buying timber land.

"'He has a lovely bungalow near the home of my patient, and we will live there.' She seemed so happy I could say nothing. 'Of course he will be obliged to keep sober now, since prohibition has made it unlawful to have liquor shipped into the state.'

"'Some get it anyway,' I said.

"'The man I love would no more violate the liquor law than he would commit murder or steal,' she declared proudly. 'Besides, he will have me to watch over him. He was a brave soldier in France and will be a fine man yet!'

"Edna's patient grew worse, and one evening she phoned me that the woman had passed away, and she would return after eleven o'clock in the car of a friend of the bereaved family. I did not retire, although it was long after midnight when I heard Edna enter the front door. She walked into the living room with a firm step, head up, and flashing eyes.

"'So sorry I kept you up,' she said, 'but we had a punctured tire, and were delayed.'

"She paused, and looking at her I knew that some great change had taken place. She continued:

"'We drove back by way of the Cottrell bungalow. Clarence and his friends were having a carousal. The chauffeur stopped near the house to change the tire, and we could not help seeing what was taking place. The men were so drunk they crawled around the festive bowl and sang disgusting songs. Clarence was the leader. He, at last, staggered to his feet, and called out: "Fellows—here's to the best sport in the world, the hooch seller! And we'll drink to the girls that are sweet on us." There was much maudlin applause—but I do not care to mention the rest. I never want to see or hear of Clarence Cottrell again.'

"The next morning she left for a city in the middle-west and when young Cottrell called that evening I did not give him her address, although I was sure she was completely cured of her infatuation. This letter I am reading tells me that she is married and is very, very happy. Whom did she marry? Dr. Hendrix, of course. His theory of a cure for love blindness was correct, and I am glad it came before a fine woman's life was wrecked."

The Federal prohibition commissioner is right when he says that enforcement of prohibition will bring an added weight of authority to all law.

At the present time the lax enforcement of prohibition weakens public respect for statutes of all kinds. It is not surprising if a man who violates the Eighteenth Amendment and the statutes enacted to render it operative adopts a rigorous attitude toward other laws. Vol. XLVIII — EVANSTON, ILLINOIS, MAY 11, 1922 — No. 19

The Second Sunday in May has been set aside by the United States Congress as MOTHERS' DAY

"WHEREAS, the service rendered the United States by the American Mother is the greatest source of the country's strength and inspiration, and

"WHEREAS, we honor ourselves and the Mothers of America when we do anything to give emphasis to the home as the fountain head of the state; and,

"WHEREAS, the American Mother is doing so much for the home, the moral uplift and religion, hence so much for good government and humanity; therefore, be it

"Resolved * * * that the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation to display the United States flag upon all government buildings, and the people of the United States to display the flag at their homes or other suitable places, on the second Sunday in May as a public expression of our love and reverence for the Mothers of our country."

How can we better observe "Mothers' Day" than by renewing our own memberships in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and, as a token of our appreciation for the mother-love which has followed us through all our lives, enlisting as many women as we can reach in the ranks of those who are endeavoring, with the help of God, to "make the world itself a larger home"?

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

ANTI-NARCOTIC DRUG BILL PASSES HOUSE—OVERSEAS WOMEN IN NATIONAL CONVENTION—HOMELAND FOR JEWISH PEOPLE — APPROPRIATION FOR GOOD ROADS—THREE PER CENT IMMIGRATION BILL FINISHED—TARIFF BILL CONSIDERATION MOVES SLOWLY

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Anti-Narcotic Drug Bill Passes House

The Miller Anti-Morphin or, as it is better designated, the Anti-Narcotic Drug Bill, passed the House Thursday without a dissenting vote and has been referred to the Senate.

Write your senators at once of your interest in this measure and appeal for their active support to secure its prompt passage.

A synopsis of the bill is here given and a comparison of the present law with its provisions, showing the manner in which the law is to be enlarged and strengthened.

1. It enables the United States to comply with the provisions of the International Opium Convention of 1912, commonly known as the Hague Convention.

2. By making morphin and cocaine a "watched article of commerce" the world over and by strengthening the law relating to opium prepared for smoking, which is now a "commercial outlaw."

3. By increasing the penalty of violators to a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding ten years.

4. By the deportation of alien offenders as undesirable citizens.

5. By putting the whole narcotic program, so far as it relates to morphin, cocaine and the salts and derivatives therof, under the authority of the Federal Narcotics Control Board—composed of three principal Cabinet officers—who regulate the amount of raw material to be imported and manufactured into narcotic drugs for medicinal purposes and legitimate uses; the control of the amount to be manufactured for medical purposes only, with the authority to increase the same should there be a medical demand therefor, thus enabling the medical profession to have all that is necessary to meet an emergency such as an epidemic.

6. By controlling transshipments and in transit shipments by rail and water.

7. By seeing to it that countries to which narcotic drugs are exported comply with the International Opium Convention of 1912, and that such countries have a system of control of narcotic drugs which the Board deems adequate and which nations can thereby be entrusted with these dangerous drugs to be used exclusively within such countries for medical uses. The Board shall close down exports to countries which "transship." This insures that American narcotics will be kept out of China. The Board may increase the amount exported to any country party to the Hague Convention which has adequate laws governing the control of narcotics in order that the medical profession of such country may have a necessary supply for its use.

8. By providing the legislation to overcome the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit, relating to narcotic drugs not on a ship's manifest.

We are indebted to Congressman John F. Miller of Washington for much valuable and detailed information.

Overseas Women in National Convention

This week hundreds of delegates have been attending the national convention of the Woman's Overseas Service League. The membership of the League is confined to women who served overseas during the world war.

A GREAT RESPONSIBILITY RESTS UPON WHITE RIBBONERS IN ELECTING A "DRY" CONGRESS

In the primaries and conventions which take place between now and October, 435 Congressmen and 35 Senators (three more than the usual number because of deaths and resignation) are to be nominated. How many are actively interested in the nomination of men and women who will stand for keeping the Federal prohibition law? Hands up! The fact that several societies, organized nationally, are at work to weaken or repeal the law by nominating and electing Senators and Representatives who favor modification is a challenge to the women who have helped secure the law.

The written declaration of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, which is leading the campaign, is first, to repeal the Volstead Act; second, to leave to each state the enforcement of prohibition through state law alone; and third, to legalize the sale of wine and beer, which would mean the return of breweries and wineries with the system necessary for distribution, thus making the Prohibition Amendment nonenforceable. It would bring back most of the evils of political corruption which the Eighteenth Amendment abolished.

The campaign is on to elect wet Congressmen. What are you doing about it? Your responsibility cannot be shirked.

Primaries have already been held in South Dakota, Illinois, and Indiana. Pennsylvania comes next.

These women have called on members of Congress to ask that a national charter be granted the League. Many of them also made direct appeals for the passage of the soldier bonus.

Homeland for Jewish People

A Senate resolution, sponsored by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, has been reported favorably by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The resolution declares for non-interference of persons of other than Jewish faith in Palestine and also for protection of Christian shrines.

Appropriation for Flood Sufferers

Congress hurried through a resolution appropriating $200,000 to be immediately available for the protection of life and property in certain portions of the Mississippi flood districts.

Appropriation for Good Roads

By a vote of 239 to 31 the House passed a bill authorizing an appropriation of $65,000 for road building for the year beginning July 1 and $75,000 for the year after.

Under the provisions of this bill, which has gone to the Senate for consideration, the Federal funds would be used in connection with state aid appropriations.

Thomas B. Dunn of New York, in charge of the measure, stated that since the cost of road building has decreased since the war, the Federal share was limited to $12,500 a mile for the year ending June 30, 1923, and thereafter to $10,000 a mile. The sum of $6,500,000 is authorized for forest roads and trails for the year ending June 30, 1924.

Three Per Cent Immigration Bill Finished

The House adopted, 257 to 36, the conference report on the Immigration bill, extending the 3 per cent immigration limitation to June 30, 1925. The Senate having acted upon the report, the bill now goes to the President.

Tariff Bill Consideration Moves Slowly

After twelve days, the Senate on Wednesday of this week voted on the first item in the chemical schedule, this being accepted by a vote of 47 to 2, after an amendment, offered by Senator King of Utah, to cut the rate, had been rejected.

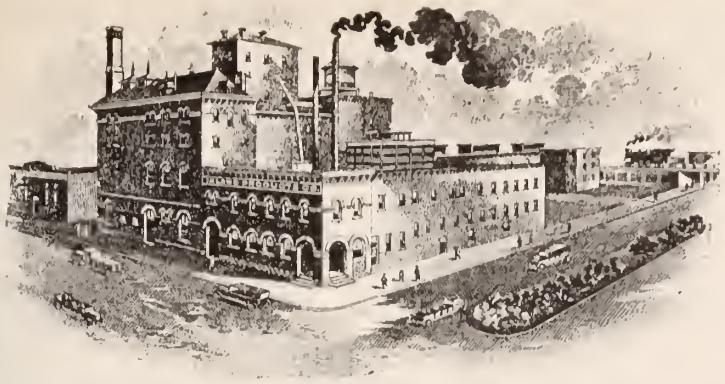
On Thursday, the thirteenth day, the Senate voted on the second committee amendment, rejecting by a vote of 26 to 47 an amendment by Senator Jones of New Mexico to reduce the proposed duty on boric acid from 1½ cents a pound to ¾ of 1 cent a pound.

There has been comparatively little debate on the Tariff Bill. Much of the time since the bill was presented to the Senate has been occupied by a discussion of probable issues in the coming primary and election campaigns.

An estimate, showing that at the present rate the pending Tariff Bill will be passed September 29, 1946, was made by Senator McCumber of North Dakota, in charge of the measure, who said the estimate had been prepared by an expert who based his calculations on the fact that just 2 of the 2,000 odd Senate Committee amendments to the measure had been acted on in thirteen days. "I think, after listening to the debate today," said Mr. McCumber, "we will have to add thirty or forty days more to that estimate." Senator Jones of New Mexico has announced that a roll call will be demanded on each of the 2000 or more amendments.

The Senate now convenes at eleven instead of twelve o'clock and it is certain that night sessions will soon be necessary.

Legislative Headquarters, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., May 6, 1922.



FROM BREWERY TO PURE FOOD FACTORY

The Inland Brewery, one of the largest in Spokane, Washington, in pre-prohibition days, has been converted into a pure food manufacturing establishment. Charles H. Shinkle, consulting engineer, who superintended the arrangements for the new factory, is reported to have said that upon the completion of its plant, the Inland Products Company, as it is now known, "will be able to manufacture just as good fruit juices, catsup, chili sauce, maple syrup, and other products as the imported articles now being bought from the east. At the same time a saving will be effected in the freight to and from the Atlantic seaboard, and a market will be furnished for all our farm products at good figures." The company will be able to make or handle the following products: Butter, cheese, poultry, eggs, ice, beverages, vinegar, pickles, kraut, catsup, pork and beans, sauces, and condiments, jellies and jams and apple butter. The candy department, another unit of the plant, now has a capacity of five hundred pounds a day.

In addition to its manufacturing facilities, the factory has storage room for fruits and vegetables, with a complete ventilating system.

More than $100,000 has been spent in converting the brewery to its present uses. While preparations for the various departments have been made on a scale considerably beyond the market needs at this time, it is the belief of the president that the demand for home products is so great that within a few years the former brewery, now a food factory, will be taxed to its capacity.

The Home Brew Raisin Is Extinct

In his annual report to the California Associated Raisin Company, President Wylie M. Giffin said:

"The home brew industry, so far as the raisin business is concerned, is practically a thing of the past." That market vanished as quickly as it came. In 1920 large amounts were used; in 1921 practically none."

California Communities Continue to Fall Into Line

The communities of California are continuing to show their sentiment toward the Wright Bill which is to be submitted to the people of the state this fall in a way which would seem to forecast the adoption of that measure. Two more towns have passed enforcement ordinances of their own, putting the responsibility of the enforcement of prohibition upon their town officials—Ferndale and Hayward. The Ferndale town trustees passed the ordinance by a unanimous vote.

Australian Official to Investigate Prohibition in America

According to the press, a commissioner will be sent by the state of New South Wales, Australia, to learn the truth about prohibition in America. The Australian government will act upon his report.

Bishop Sumner Foe of Beer

The Rt. Rev. Walter T. Sumner, Bishop of Oregon, formerly of Chicago, believes that the legalization of beer would be a fatal mistake. In an interview given to the Chicago Tribune, during a recent visit to that city, the Bishop said:

"It is folly for liquor men to charge up the present wave of crime to prohibition. It would have been ten times worse if we hadn't had prohibition. When I was dean of the Cathedral in Chicago the men found lying around drunk all day in my neighborhood were drunk on beer. They didn't drink whisky. Men drink for the effect the alcohol has on them and they will continue to drink until the effect is produced. Oregon is satisfied with prohibition and we don't want beer or wine."

Bishop Sumner was never an aggressive opponent of the liquor traffic until, as chairman of the Chicago Vice Commission many years ago, he made a study of conditions and became persuaded that drink was the strongest ally of those who were promoting the social evil. He has ever since been an ardent temperance advocate.

Movies to Help in Enforcement of Law

The support and co-operation of the moving picture industry in the enforcement of, and the respect for, law has been pledged by its new chief, Will H. Hays, says the North American of Philadelphia, in reporting a conference between Mr. Hays and the heads of the Philadelphia Law Enforcement League, recently held in New York City.

Mr. Nicholson, secretary of the league, pointed out the fact that in a good many moving-picture houses the impression prevailed that it is good business to refer slightingly to violations of the law. He argued that this undoubtedly leads audiences to believe that those intrusted with law enforcement will wink at violations. This, he said, would ultimately weaken the whole fabric of the law and would lead to a state of anarchy.

Mr. Hays replied that he had noticed the tendency, and that as an American citizen he deplored it. He promised to use every effort in his power to obviate this tendency so far as the moving-picture houses are concerned, and point out to the industry the undesirability of permitting this to continue.

Rhode Island Legislature Passes Dry Enforcement Law; Governor Approves

One of the last acts of the Rhode Island legislature, on the closing day of the session, was the passage by both houses of a comprehensive prohibition enforcement bill. Governor San Souci on May 3 approved the law, and it goes into effect at once. Rhode Island is one of the two states which have not yet ratified the Eighteenth Amendment.

Prominent Indiana White Ribboner Nominated as State Senator

News has been received of the nomination as state senator of Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, National W. C. T. U. director of Americanization, at the primaries, May 2, by a majority of 698. Her opponent has a record for talking and voting against prohibition legislation. It was a clear line-up in which the women showed their ability to defeat a candidate who had been against the state enforcement code.

Will Beer and Wine Return?

"It is utterly impossible by amending the act to permit the sale and manufacture of beer and wine," Dr. Henius said, as quoted by the press, "as it is a recognized fact that wine is intoxicating and beer over three per cent may be. The Eighteenth Amendment prohibits the manufacture, sale and importation of intoxicating beverages. In order to get wine and beer restored to their former status, it would be necessary to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment."

"Beer" Recorded As Obsolete Word in Revised Edition of the Encyclopedia Americana

"Such words as 'beer' and 'wine' and the names of other intoxicants are recorded as 'obsolete' in the revised edition of the Encyclopedia Americana," says the Christian Science Monitor. "The Eighteenth Amendment, which outlawed the liquor traffic in the United States, is responsible. Recognizing the existence of prohibition, the encyclopedia thus has set a new style for reference compendiums of the future, by referring to the brewing and distilling business in the United States in the past tense. Likewise, treatises on beer and its manufacture, on methods of distillation and brewing in general, have had all present tenses edited out wherever the United States is concerned and past tenses substituted. 'What Beer Was and Is' is the heading of an account of that beverage's alcoholic contents."

FEELING THE PULSE OF THE CHICAGO SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS ON THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Few people have better opportunity to observe the effects of prohibition on family life than do the residents in the social settlements of a big city. Visits were made by a representative of THE UNION SIGNAL to several of these "home centers" in the congested foreign districts of Chicago, for the purpose of learning the opinions of the workers. Without exception, all who were interviewed gave it as their judgment that the prohibitory law, while inadequately enforced, is, nevertheless, of marked value.

Decided Improvement in Neighborhood Conditions, Says Mary McDowell of Chicago University Settlement

The head resident of the Chicago University Settlement, in the Union Stock Yards District, Miss Mary McDowell, most enthusiastically endorsed the law. She said there had been a decided improvement in the home life and neighborhood conditions since prohibition went into operation. One especially noticed the difference on Saturday nights, when shooting affrays used to be common. The attitude of the younger generation was illustrated by a neighborhood incident. The head of the family set up a still and was making his own liquor. The son and daughter, who worked down in the city, upon discovering the still, decided that such lawlessness was not to be tolerated, and surreptitiously made holes in it, letting the liquor run out. The father was overheard talking the situation over with himself: "How did it ever happen? The deadly stuff must be going to my brain, or I'd never have done it. Guess I better give it up." "The moving picture managers in this neighborhood will tell you," said Miss McDowell, "that the men are coming in with their families in the evening to see the pictures, instead of spending their money to load up with drink."

Before and After Prohibition, Seen through the Eyes of Harriet Vittum, head resident Northwestern University Settlement

"I was brought up in a home where we never used alcoholic liquors, and the theory was that everyone must use self-control and not yield to the temptation to indulge in strong drink," said Miss Harriet Vittum, head resident of the Northwestern University Settlement, Chicago, to a representative of THE UNION SIGNAL who sought to know her views on the prohibition situation. "I belonged to a Band of Hope in the Sunday school," continued Miss Vittum, "and grew up with the idea that the way to deal with the liquor evil was to control individual appetites. Seventeen years ago I came to Chicago. At that time, while I abominated drunkenness, I did not believe in prohibition, but I had not lived long in this neighborhood where I continually saw wives beaten by drunken husbands, and children underfed and lacking clothing because their fathers wasted their earnings at the saloon, where at the same time I observed the prosperity of the saloon-keepers and the millionaire brewers, before I changed my ideas and became a rampant prohibitionist. During the years I have lived in this largely foreign district, I have had all sorts of interesting discussions with all sorts of people on the subject of prohibition. I have been fighting liquor in the dance halls for fifteen years, and have lived to see it practically cleaned out and the dance halls almost a thing of the past. As I say, I have argued with every sort of person on the question of prohibition, and when the law finally went into operation, it was one of the most wonderful experiences I ever had to watch the changed attitude of people who were formerly opposed to it. For instance, our janitor had an intimate friend, a good man when sober, but when intoxicated abusive to his family, who was so wedded to his drink that he threatened to commit suicide if prohibition went into effect. Shortly after the dry law came in, the janitor said to me, 'Well, Alex is still here; he hasn't committed suicide, and he's getting along all right without his drink, and his family is a lot better off.'

President of Illinois Steel Company Testifies to Advantages of Prohibition

E. J. BUFFINGTON,
President Illinois Steel Company,
Chicago, Illinois.

Our observations of the influence of prohibition upon our employes are that they report for work with greater regularity, resulting in a decrease in the percentage of our "labor turnover"; that the average efficiency of employes has increased; that personal injuries due to accidents at the mills have decreased, and that the average economic condition of employes' families is improved.

Improvement in the economic condition of employes' families is evidenced by the fewer cases of economic distress reported to us during the present period of decreased employment at our steel plants. In previous periods of decreased employment we have found it necessary to contribute relief to families of employes in far greater number than at present. Furthermore, the visiting nurses whom we employ for administering aid to families of employes in case of sickness, report that the economic condition of such families is very much better than was to be found prior to prohibition.

It may be that some of the above mentioned observed results are due in part to causes other than prohibition.

In our opinion they are the result mainly of prohibition.

And Now They Have a Ford

"On a certain Monday morning after prohibition came into operation, I was on my way to the police station, when I met a woman of the neighborhood, whose family we had helped right along to feed and clothe. Her husband drank, and she had to work out to help support herself and the family. She said, 'Well, Miss Vittum, I'm going to stop working out and stay at home with the children. Since this here prohibition I don't have to work any more. My man takes care of us.' For the first time in its history the Rice family was properly fed and clothed, and last year that family had enough money saved to buy a Ford car, and week-ends they go out into the country. Only last Sunday, I saw the whole family passing in their car, as happy as can be.

"Well, that same morning," continued Miss Vittum, "I went down to the police station, and there I met one of my old friends, a police officer, who had been very much opposed to prohibition—we'd frequently argued in a friendly way about it. As I came up, he said, 'You win, Miss Vittum. I give up. Look at that court room. You know how it usually is Monday morning, so full you can hardly step in. Now, see, it's 'most empty.'

"Next I had occasion to go to the store of a prosperous business man. He said, 'I am ready to admit I was mistaken on this prohibition question. People that never before paid their bills are paying them now. It's a good thing all right.'

"That sort of thing went on for several months. It showed what real prohibition can do. Then there came a change, and the old country people began making their home brew, and the bootleggers went to manufacturing and selling moonshine liquor. When Judge Landis rendered his drastic decisions, there was a cessation of this lawlessness and for three or four months the law-violating element were quiescent. I have come to the conclusion that we are now going through another spasm, and that it is only temporary. The great gain, to my mind, is that the boys and girls of this vicinity and every other are not being tempted by the sale of liquor on the street corners. From what I know of conditions it is not the younger men of this district as a rule that are drinking."

Great Gain for the Boys and Girls

"Then you consider that notwithstanding the laxity in law enforcement, there has been a great permanent change for the better?" Miss Vittum was asked.

"Yes, indeed," was the answer. "We used to have eight saloons within a stone's throw of the Settlement. Five have entirely disappeared as saloons, and the other three, although they may be selling some liquor, are apparently fairly decent. On a recent Saturday night there was a shooting in the neighborhood, and we all said, 'Why, this seems like old times, before prohibition, when we used to have shootings and general pandemonium every Saturday night.' The whole atmosphere of the neighborhood is cleaner. The women of this community, if they were left to themselves, would be strong for prohibition, but many of these foreign women hesitate to speak for themselves. The difference in the condition of the children under prohibition has been tremendous. Inadequately enforced as is the law in Chicago, it has been the means of giving the children in any number of families a square deal. For the first time in their pinched little lives they have had nourishing food and comfortable clothes. If for no other reason than to give the children a better chance to grow up in decent surroundings, without constant temptation, prohibition has been well worth while."

Improved Family Life Due to Prohibition is Testimony of Jane Addams

At the Hull House, in the absence of Miss Jane Addams, the presiding genius, an assistant expressed the belief that prohibition had been a blessing and told of generally improved conditions in the family life. Later, Miss Addams by letter, gave the testimony which appeared in last week's SIGNAL, to the effect that prohibition had reduced poverty, according to statistics of the United Charities, had lessened commitments to the House of Corrections for minor offenses, and promoted a more normal family life.

THE PROHIBITION UNIT OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Lenna Lowe Yost, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation

Why the Prohibition Unit, and What?

The proponents in the Federal Congress of the legislation leading up to the approval by the states in sufficient number under the Constitution to make the Eighteenth Amendment effective, early saw that machinery of a most practical, far-reaching and efficient character should be built up if a prohibition amendment were adopted. The act of Congress of October 28, 1919, the one under which the establishment of the Prohibition Unit is authorized, was therefore adopted. These same proponents were men of vision, but even they were unable to look into the future sufficiently to realize at the time the ramifications which the Unit, in practical operation, would take.

They knew the opposition to the prohibition cause, however, and therefore realized the need for the providing of legislation which, properly administered, would enable the government to cope with resourceful, voluntary violators of the letter and the spirit of the law. Hence, they builded the best they could in the light of the experiences of the past, and a law much stronger than some, friends as well as enemies, had ever dreamed could be enacted, was put upon the statute books.

The misgivings of the framers of the enforcement act, which caused them to insist upon one with teeth in it, have been amply justified, as the records of the Unit and of the Federal courts will testify. Violations and attempted violations have been persistent and of great extent, and backed by unscrupulous men with unlimited money. The majesty of the law has been challenged. The Federal government, as represented by its officers and its courts of justice, has been laughed to scorn. The why of the Prohibition Unit therefore would seem to be apparent.

A Small Army

What the Unit is, as has so often been asked, when fairly, fully answered doubtless will cause some surprise, particularly as to its size. The head of the Unit, now Major R. A. Haynes, is listed in the Congressional Directory under the Department of the Treasury, office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as "Prohibition Commissioner." He is generally referred to as Federal Prohibition Commissioner, that he be not confused with state officers holding like positions. Under Major Haynes is a force of 3,120 persons. These are divided into classes, a considerable number being located in Washington, but by far the greater number being stationed in the field.

The office of Prohibition Commissioner was established January 17, 1920, by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under authority granted by the Act of October 28, 1919. It was established in restricted quarters a short distance from the Treasury Department building, but it soon outgrew these quarters and was moved to the south side of F Street northwest, between Thirteenth and Fourteenth.

The Prohibition Unit, in a nutshell, has authority over the handling of liquors of whatever character and for whatever purpose. In addition, the Unit is charged with the administration of the so-called Harrison Narcotic Act. The latter regulates the importation, manufacture, production, compounding, sale, dispensing and giving away of opium and cocoa leaves and their derivatives. The personnel which had charge of administering the Narcotic Act prior to the time nation-wide prohibition became effective, was transferred to the Prohibition Unit and is now functioning as a part of the latter.

The Prohibition Commissioner has immediately under him as executives of his office an assistant commissioner and a deputy commissioner. The Assistant Commissioner acts in the absence of the Commissioner. There are also the following divisions: Field, Permit, Audit and Statistics, and Legal. All of these are kept constantly on the go as a result of the many and involved problems falling to the lot of the respective personnels to solve.

Mother

Never a sigh for the cares that she bore for me,
Never a thought of the joys that flew by;
Her one regret that she couldn't do more for me,
Thoughtless and selfish, her master was I.

Oh, the long nights that she came at my call to me!
Oh, the soft touch of her hands on my brow!
Oh, the long years that she gave up her all to me!
Oh! how I yearn for her gentleness now!

Slave to her baby! Yes, that was the way of her,
Counting her greatest of services small:
Words cannot tell what this old heart would say of her,
Mother—the sweetest and fairest of all.

—From "A Heap o' Livin'"—by Edgar A. Guest.

The field force has two subdivisions—Prohibition Directors and Enforcement Agents. Each state has a director who is in general charge of the enforcement of the prohibition laws within his territory. He is called upon particularly to administer the permissive features of the law, and as a result passes upon all applications for permits coming from residents of his state before the same are forwarded to Washington, where final action is taken. Also, when holders of permits such as physicians, for the writing of prescriptions, and druggists, for the filling of the same, are charged with violating the regulations and investigations are made, the state director is called upon to pass judgment. His decision may be appealed from, but it is the general rule of the Commissioner at Washington to sustain state directors in their rulings.

Duties of Inspectors

Inspectors serving under state directors are kept constantly busy visiting plants where near-intoxicants are manufactured and establishments used for the preparation of different commercial products, such as medicinal preparations, hair tonics, etc., for the purpose of reporting on violations by permit holders of privileges granted to them. A most thorough investigation is made by these inspectors of persons applying for original permits for writing prescriptions, filling prescriptions, or otherwise using intoxicating liquors in their business.

The regular inspection of prescription books used by physicians in prescribing alcohol involves a task of considerable proportions, and a number of cases are reported each year in which physicians are charged with exceeding the number of prescriptions allowed them or with otherwise violating the rules and regulations laid down for their guidance. One of the problems with which the office of the Prohibition Commissioner and his assistants throughout the country have to deal is that of watching unscrupulous physicians who seek to use their profession to increase their bank accounts, without regard to the law, or the ethics of their profession.

The Permit Division at Washington is a hive of industry. All applications for permits which come from over the country must be checked up by this force. Since the passage and approval of the National Prohibition Act, no intoxicating liquors or alcohol may be withdrawn from bond without request for authority therefor being first secured from the Federal Commissioner. These permit take in, for example, the transporting, prescribing, importing, exporting, and use in the manufacturing of commercial products of liquors and alcohol and the selling of the same in wholesale or retail quantities. Confusion often results when an applicant not thoroughly familiar with the regulations files an application for a permit for a class other than that to which he would be entitled, should he prove his case.

In such cases action is taken by the state director and the application sent to Washington for review there, only to find that an error has been made by the applicant and a lot of unnecessary work done. This is suggested as indicating that thorough familiarity with what is required and permitted will tend to expedite the granting of permits to good-faith applicants, and save a much overworked bureau unnecessary effort.

Liquor in Storage

The Division of Audit and Statistics is called upon to supervise all liquors in government bonded warehouses, where distillers place their products immediately after manufacture. Raw whisky is placed in bonded warehouses for the purpose of aging it. While there it must be protected from theft. Also, as a result of its retention there, payment to the government when the liquor is withdrawn from bond for sale is guaranteed. The Prohibition Unit is kept informed as to the character and amount of all whisky in bonded warehouses through the work of storekeeper-guagers who check up on the same and send reports regularly to the Collector of Internal Revenue to be transmitted to the Internal Revenue Bureau at Washington. It is expected that this task will be simplified now that Congress has passed and the President has approved a bill under which all whisky in bonded warehouses is to be concentrated in a limited number of warehouses.

The Legal Division of the Prohibition Unit is just what its name suggests. This force must pass upon law points involved in the many and puzzling problems reaching the Commissioner and advise him as to his course in regard to each case. When cases arise in which clear violations of the law have taken place the Legal Division so advises the Commissioner, who in turn refers the matter to the Department of Justice for prosecution of the offenders. "EVERYBODY COMING; WHEELS ALL HUMMING; EVERYBODY WORKING; NOBODY SHIRKING; EVERYBODY PAYING; EVERYBODY PRAYING!"

State after state swung into line in April for the spring Membership Campaign. The Trio Team plan is everywhere promoting the spirit and practice of team work. New activities and new standards are being developed by this recognition of distinctive obligations on the part of the officers—president, corresponding secretary and treasurer. While the method provides for close co-operation among this group of officers throughout the chain, from local to state Trio Team, yet each has her individual responsibility.

THE UNION SIGNAL Trio Team list of subscribers lengthens, as it should, for no member of this particular group can do the best work without the up-to-the-minute information to be found in each last issue of the official organ.

A very general observance of Mothers' Day, May 14—a National W. C. T. U. red letter day, the "peak" of the Membership Campaign—is slated on many state campaign programs. The day has been officially recognized by Congress, and Postmaster General Work is making the suggestion that as an appropriate recognition of our pride in, and our veneration for, the mothers of the nation, the Stars and Stripes be displayed on all post-office buildings on May 14.

Model "Hold Fast" Union

The Columbus (Ga.) W. C. T. U. has twelve groups of fifty members, each with its own Trio Team of chairman, secretary and treasurer, to direct its activities "according to a plan." Once a month the group teams report to the main team—the president, corresponding secretary and treasurer of this enthusiastic union of 600 members.

The Georgia W. C. T. U. followed the initiative of the National W. C. T. U. in giving special recognition at the state convention to all unions "holding fast" those who were members at the beginning of the Jubilee Membership campaign in 1920. Columbus union was among the "Distinguished Unions" awarded handsome badges at the 1921 state convention.

In addition to its prominence as a "holdfast" union, Columbus has made a record for itself in a political way. At a recent election each leader divided her women into groups to go to the polls, and cars were sent to call for them. They were checked as they voted. The liquor politicians were dumbfounded by this coup. One said that never before had he seen anything like it. The group leaders worked like machines and the women voted solid.

Georgia has solved the problem of handling a large membership. The unions are divided into groups of fifty each, formed according to neighborhoods or sections of the city. The president appoints a leader for each group, the members elect a secretary and treasurer. The three constitute the Trio Team. The president also appoints as a board of directors, five W. C. T. U. members who understand the work. Five directors with the president is sufficient for a union of from 200 to 300 members. The directors plan programs and, with all material, furnish to leaders typewritten copies showing date, time and place of the various group meetings, and attend to the incidental publicity. The assistance of the respective superintendent is asked when a program is being arranged for her department. Two meetings a month are held by the groups—one in the home of some member in each of the five different sections of the city, and one general meeting in each of several churches for the purpose of summing up the work, leaders having full time in which to tell what has been done, treasurers to report the amount of dues collected as well as money for other purposes. Department superintendents name an associate in each group, thereby providing in the town or city a number of workers for all the various departments. Group department associates turn their reports over to the general department superintendent, who makes a composite report.

The advantage of organization under the group plan can readily be seen. First, all the work of the W. C. T. U. can easily be carried on and the collection of dues made less difficult. Each treasurer collects from members of her group and turns over to the general treasurer the amounts paid. Attendance is stimulated owing to shorter distances, less time is consumed, friends and neighbors meet socially, and each group develops the ambition to count for the most good in the community.

Legislative work can be systematically handled through the group leaders, each to be responsible for having every woman in her group registered, and urging her co-operation in the effort to place in office candidates favorable to the prohibitory law.

Olympia's Harvest 200 New Members

The place is Olympia, Washington, a city with a population of about 10,000, and capital of the state. The leading figure is Central union, which decided to take time by the forelock and hold a membership contest in March. The old-fashioned way of dividing the membership into groups, with captains to direct activities, was adopted. At the close of the specified time it was found that, with so little extra exertion that not a soul panted for breath, more than two hundred new members had been added. A great reception and banquet was given old and new members, at which time an already interested community was still further aroused and those who had just entered the ranks made to feel that they were in a worthwhile organization of Christian women.

A special feature of the work of the two local unions in Olympia is their activity in the matter of law enforcement. Members attend trials of liquor law violators, sit on juries, watch the records of law enforcement officers, and exercise a wholesome influence during the sessions of the state legislature.

A Whirlwind Campaign

A whirlwind Membership Campaign which has already drawn into its vortex 900 new members! That is the modest achievement of the Southern California W. C. T. U., whose slogan is speed. Indeed, through its cyclonic methods the sum of $843.50 has been blown into the state treasury, and the other half of the total collections of $1,687 carried to country and local unions. Surely, not an ill wind!

How do they do it? Here's the secret:

The president, Mrs. Eva C. Wheeler and another state officer, go into a county and visit every town. They hold in each a public meeting, advertising, in advance, Mrs. Wheeler's address, "Lands Beneath the Southern Cross," with slides and curios. Her fellow worker also gives a short talk and members and money are solicited. The next day the members of the local union—two and two—are sent out to do home calling the other state officer going with some prominent local woman to the most important places. At noon the workers meet at the church, have lunch, report and then make more calls. Toward evening the speakers go on to the next appointment. When the county is covered with the exception of the largest city, conference is held one afternoon, with a community dinner or banquet at 6:30. Placards three feet square, bearing the pictures of the speakers, help to call the attention of the public to the occasion. Church tables have been arranged, with a friendly rivalry between different denominations to see who can secure the largest attendance. A conference is held all the succeeding day, with a second evening program. The state offers a prize to the county, which in turn offers one to the local unions, for the securing of the largest attendance. The members of the various unions wear bits of different colored ribbon.

Results have more than justified the expenditure of energy. Every place visited has doubled its membership, sometimes trebled it; the budget, a sum equal to one dollar per member, has been raised and enough money has been put into the state treasury to pay the salaries and all expenses of the workers.

Mobilize a Million Members

Third Intensive Membership Campaign for 3 days each Week of 3 Weeks—April 24–May 14

1. Have 3 canvassers for each day in small unions; multiples of 3 in large unions.
2. Interest 3 groups especially: (a) Women in the churches. (b) Young women. (c) Women in business. 3. Get 3 special supplies prepred for intensive campaign. Secure them from National W. C. T. U. Publishing House or state W. C. T. U. headquarters.

MAY WE COUNT ON YOU?

Dear Women Patriots:

The women of this country today face a plain duty in meeting the attack on the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law, of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. The issue is placed squarely before us, and will come up for decision at the Congressional election next fall.

The women of this nation initiated and backed the movement to free our land from the legalized liquor traffic. The women have been the tireless, fearless champions of national prohibition. The women, by standing shoulder to shoulder in the present crisis, will not only hold the prohibition law but secure its observance and thus insure the wide-spread benefits that are the certain result of its enforcement.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union asks you and your friends to join our organization as a protest against the efforts to nullify and repeal the national prohibitory law.

May we count on you to help us by praying, talking, working and voting at the November election for the retention of the present dry laws and their more adequate enforcement?

Yours for a better world,
President of the W. C. T. U.

ANSWERS YOU WILL RECEIVE FROM THE WOMEN OF YOUR COMMUNITY TO AN INVITATION TO JOIN THE W. C. T. U.

"I Want to Enlist"

Dear Mrs. ———:

Did you write that letter asking me to join your organization because you knew my blessed mother was a Crusader? I could almost hear my sainted mater saying to me, "Jane, I was in the first Crusade; you must enlist for this last great Crusade to put an end to the enemy of the home." I am unworthy to be the daughter of my self-sacrificing, courageous mother, but I'll do my utmost to represent her in the cause that you are so magnificently promoting. I enclose a check for membership. Count me in as one of your workers.

A CRUSADER'S DAUGHTER.

"I Have Five Sons"

Dear Mrs. ———:

May I thank you most heartily for inviting me to join the W. C. T. U. I read the letter aloud to my husband, and we agreed that there is nothing more important just now than the work you are doing. I have five wonderful reasons growing up in my home to make me heart and soul with you in the campaign against the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. It frightens me to think what it would mean to our five boys if a wet Congress should be elected next fall. But it never will be. The mothers of this country will take care of that. I shall try to get all my friends to join your organization.

Gratefully,
MOTHER OF FIVE.

"Here's My Dollar and Here's My Heart"

Dear Mrs. ———:

If I hadn't received your letter of invitation, I should have called you, or some other W. C. T. U. woman, up on the phone to ask to be admitted to your ranks. I've been reading in the Literary Digest of the line-up against the association attacking the Prohibition Amendment, and see that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is mobilizing the mothers for the big campaign. I belong to half a dozen other organizations and while they are doing good work, they don't seem to be specializing on this most important task of holding and enforcing the "Home Protection Law." Because the W. C. T. U. is doing just that, here's my dollar and my heart. Assign me any task and I'll give you of my best.

Enthusiastically,
MEMBER OF MANY CLUBS.

"Of Course I'll Join NOW"

Dear Mrs. ———:

Many times you have asked me to join your union, and always I have given you what seemed to me an adequate excuse—"too busy"—"other interests." But now I hasten to reply, "Yes, a thousand times, yes." I will join you, and I'll put on the white ribbon. Indeed, I feel like wearing half a dozen of them to signify my protest against the efforts of the enemies of prohibition to overturn the dry law. For the sake of the small boy who calls me "Mother" I shall make work for prohibition the paramount interest for the next few months. Command me.

Sincerely,
BUD'S MOTHER.

"Watch Us Come!"

Dear Mrs. ———:

My first impulse when I read your invitation was to give the stereotyped reply that I had so many other responsibilities, etc. Then I began to think what it would mean to my loved foreign missionary interests if we should fail to enforce or hold our prohibitory law. I could hear our workers in far off fields trying to explain to the heathen why Christian America went back on her dry law, and I saw it would be absolutely fatal to all our missionary work. Right then I drew out that membership card you enclosed, signed my name, and drew my check for my annual dues. I am not only going to make it my missionary duty to join you in your campaign but I am going to get every member of our church missionary society, to do the same. Watch us come.

Very Sincerely,
A FOREIGN MISSIONARY ENTHUSIAST.

"I've Changed My Mind"

Dear Sue:

It was generous of you to send me that letter of invitation to become one of you. Have you forgotten how I laughed at you for keeping on with the W. C. T. U. work after we secured national prohibition? What a short-sighted, stupid individual I was to imagine the task was finished. I'm ready to take back all I said and present myself at the next meeting of the union, in my whole armor, ready for the battle with the foes of the dry law. Do you suppose I'm not lying awake nights imagining what it would mean for little Dick and Bert and Paul to grow up in an alcohol-infested world. Give me the very hardest job you have, and I'll tackle it with a whole heart.

Cordially,
MRS. "CHANGED HER MIND."

Congratulations to Mrs. Vayhinger!

The nomination of Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national W. C. T. U. director of Americanization, as state senator in the Indiana legislature is a telling triumph for prohibition. Her opponent's antagonism to the dry law was well known. Indiana is to be congratulated on having nominated this gifted campaigner in many prohibition battles. She will undoubtedly have the support of the best citizens of the "Hoosier" state, at the coming election.

Cheer for Rhode Island!

A great victory has been won by the prohibition forces of Rhode Island in the passage, at the closing session of the legislature, of a prohibition enforcement law which is most comprehensive. For three years, ever since the refusal by the senate to ratify the Eighteenth Amendment, the temperance workers have labored for an enforcement law which should adequately carry out the purpose of the Amendment, and put Rhode Island on a par with the other states of the Union. During this time there has been a remarkable growth of prohibition sentiment. We congratulate our comrades upon this outcome of the long struggle, and look upon it as a happy omen of the result of the nation-wide fight during the coming months, which will culminate at the polls next November.

Mothers' Day—Membership Day

Mothers' Day, May 14, marks the close of the intensive membership drive of three weeks, and on that day thousands of new members will be enrolled in our "home protection" campaign. Every true-hearted mother will count it a privilege to unite with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—"organized mother love"—in its movement to hold and promote the observance of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law. To the self-sacrificing service of the mother-hearted women of the past and the present, in large measure, we owe the present law. What more fitting tribute can the children and grandchildren of such mothers pay on this sacred day than to promise to do their utmost to hold and enforce the law for the securing of which their devoted mothers invested so much of their lives.

How Shall I Show My Love?

"In what way can I most fittingly show my love to my own mother, and express my appreciation for all her love and sacrifice?" is the question which is being asked everywhere, silently, if not audibly. The answer is not hard to find. If she is still with you on this Mothers' Day, make her a life member, or if she walks among the immortals, immortalize her here by making her a memorial member, of the organization which, perhaps as does no other, stands for mother-love—the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. If she helped to sow the seed which has brought the harvest of the Eighteenth Amendment, do you not think that even in Heaven a note of joy will be added by such a tribute?

The National Cash Register Makes Protest De Luxe

Big Business is making its protest against the efforts to bring back wine and beer. A masterly, comprehensive statement of "What Prohibition has done for America" and how the overturning of the present law and the return of the traffic in wine and beer would waste the people's money and corrupt politics, is the latest number of American Progress, the periodical published by the National Cash Register Company of Dayton, Ohio.

A slip attached to the big four page, strikingly illustrated document, explains: "A wide-spread effort is now being made to amend the Volstead Act and bring back light wines and beer. This publication has been carefully prepared to meet that movement with what is believed to be a true statement of the facts in the case."

Hundreds of copies were distributed at the Pan-American Conference of Women, conducted by the League of Women Voters, with the significant comment:

"The women of the country can be depended upon to protect the American home and society."

Having Done All

"Having done all, to stand," says Paul. This admonition has been the subject of sermons on resignation, patience, determination, and like qualities for hundreds of years. The emphasis has been on the last word. But it should be noted that Paul, putting first things first, said that one was to stand after having done all. In respect to the question of prohibition, having done all we can to insure the failure of the "wet" program, we are to stand, knowing that, if we also labor, we may safely trust results to the Lord.

But how shall we know that we have done all we can? When may we cease endeavors with that conviction? Can we do so before the dry victory has actually been forever won? There are now thirty or more organizations working against prohibition. Shall we have done all if we cease working before they have disbanded, finding their own efforts futile?

There are certain organizations which have recently held their national conventions, and at these meetings the members brought their own liquors or were served by the entertaining towns. Have we done all we can when such flagrant defiance of the laws of the land is laughed about and no voice raised in behalf of law and order?

There are a few colleges in our land where booze parties are held. In one town a rumor went the rounds that the college students were guilty of such "doings" and the rooms of the students were raided during the morning class hours. Nothing was found; but later, a young man who was telling of the raid, remarked, with a grin, "I see by the paper that 'Prexy' is convinced that there is no liquor on the campus. If he only knew!" Until our young people appreciate the difference between fun and law violation, have we done all?

According to statistics many of the violations of the prohibition law have been committed by the foreign-born element of the population. Until these strangers are so Americanized that they will obey the laws of the country to which they have come, have we done all?

It is probable, from the government reports made at the end of the second year of prohibition, that prohibition has been enforced reasonably well during these months. But are we satisfied with a sixty-five per cent, or eignty-five per cent, efficiency of the dry law? Is that "having done all"?

A new generation of nearly thirty million young people is coming up through the schools. After them will come another throng, and then another. With scientific temperance instruction given in the class room, these coming generations will be fortified with knowledge of the effects of alcohol upon the human system. If we allow such instruction to be given up, shall we have done all?

Not long ago Commissioner Haynes addressing New York dry workers, said it was his belief that should the W. C. T. U. and other prohibition agencies cease their agitation and education, it would be but a brief time until all the ground we had gained would be lost. We must not only continue but redouble our efforts.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

Kansas Poor Territory for the Citizen's Liberty League

Evidently thirty organizations formed to fight prohibition are not enough to harm it seriously. At least another one has come into being, the Citizens' Liberty League. According to the press this society has been formed because its incorporators believe that the country is going to rack and ruin through the lawlessness created by the purity laws we have, and in order to bring back a bit of freedom and personal liberty they intend to do away with all blue laws, beginning with the Volstead Act.

The League claims Wisconsin as the place of its birth, and declares its intention of getting charters in other states as rapidly as possible. This will not be found so simple a matter as it thinks if the attitude of Kansas is indicative of the sentiment of the whole country, and even though the league should obtain a charter, it is quite possible that it might find the task of gaining adherents a case of "love's labor lost."

"In regard to a corporation of this kind being permitted to transact business in Kansas," L. J. Pettijohn, secretary of state, wrote to the incorporators, as reported by the press, "will say I do not believe the state charter board will approve the application," and members of the charter board have indicated that there might be a tendency to discourage the organization from entering Kansas.

"Explaining to Kansas that liberty and booze are the same thing probably will keep the league pretty busy," is the comment of the Kansas City Times, "and if it has anything else on hand it ought to finish it up before it gets on the new job, that is, if time is worth anything in its business."

The Topeka Journal does not believe anything would be accomplished, for "such an organization may afford remunerative position for the usual number of officers and clerks as long as its deluded followers are willing to pay their money into the treasury, but that is about all it will accomplish. The fight for complete prohibition enforcement promises to be long, hard and expensive, but it will be won in time. To eradicate completely the drinking of alcoholic liquors may require a generation or two but it will be accomplished finally."

The Bootleggers' Waterloo

History has been made in the east within the last few weeks. The man who believes that prohibition prohibits has been confirmed in his faith, while the wets have been correspondingly dismayed by the recent news that twenty Pennsylvania breweries have been closed by orders from Washington to the state prohibition enforcement headquarters, and that in the 150 trials held, there has been an unbroken record of convictions, verdicts of guilty being found in all cases.

There are a number of reasons why one looking ahead to the probable outcome of these trials would have thought himself justified in predicting something widely different. It is reported that agents of the retail liquor dealers' association made a careful investigation of the panel of jurors, that the talesmen were classified as very wet, wet, dry, or extra dry, and that the majority were said to be in favor of liquor. But shocking indeed to the bootleggers was the conduct of these jurors, who, according to the North American, judged according to facts, and seemingly without regard to any personal views regarding liquor. In the earlier cases the juries included women, and the promptness with which verdicts of guilty were returned led the attorneys for the defendants later arraigned to exclude women by challenges. But the men rendered similar verdicts, and the sex theory collapsed. These juries included representative men and women from several counties outside of Philadelphia (in whose United States district court the trials were held), who were put on the list without regard to politics.

"The whole situation has a meaning that goes beyond the concrete result of the trials," said the North American. "It signalizes a changed attitude on the part of the entire community. In the face of systematic and defiant criminality it is impossible any longer to revive controversy over the merits of prohibition; the simple and single issue is enforcement of the constitution and the law.

"Statutes of this kind, against which powerful interests organize resistance and employ far-reaching measures of evasion, do not enforce themselves; they can be made effective only through persistent, vigorous application of the law by all the agencies of government concerned—the department of justice, the prohibition bureau, the prosecuting officers, the courts and the juries. Not until the efforts of these result in making convictions of lawbreakers and their adequate punishment the rule, will enforcement become a reality.

"The demonstration which is now being given in this city will go far to cure the bootlegging interests of their delusion that the law is weak and its enforcement impossible. Not less important will be the building up of a force of public opinion which will back the government and the court in a war of extermination against a sordid and criminal traffic."

partment transmits these cases to the United States Attorney in the territory in which the alleged offense occurred for action by the Federal courts.

Assessments and fines often are imposed for violation of the Prohibition law when in the judgment of the Department of Justice officials such is advisable, instead of the imposition of jail or prison sentences. It may be that a term in jail in addition to a fine is thought proper. An important feature of the work done by the Legal Division is the interpretation of laws bearing upon prohibition and anti-narcotic questions and of regulations put into effect by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the enforcement of these laws.

The organization of the Federal Prohibition Unit as of March 1, 1922, was as follows:

Bureau (at Washington), 561 persons; Field, under the head of mobile force, thirteen field supervisors, seventy-two general prohibition agents, one general prohibition agent, temporary; forty-five Federal prohibition agents.

Field, director's forces, fifty-one Federal prohibition directors, fourteen assistant directors, thirty-two heads field force, one acting head field force, twenty-seven legal advisers, sixty-five group heads, 998 agents, twenty temporary agents, 391 warehouse agents, seventy-seven temporary warehouse agents, thirteen chemists, seven narcotic field force, 159 narcotic officers, twenty-one narcotic clerks.

Memories Mother Leaves to Me

Verne B. Brown

I'll never feel another hand like Mother's hand, I trow;
It hypnotized my aches and cares and drove them out; just how
That hand of hers could do it is a mystery to me.
But Mother's hand could turn the trick; it kept one fellow free
From pains and stains that bruise and smart—
That hand of Mother's touched my heart.

I'll never hear another voice like Mother's voice, I'm sure;
It sounded love-notes in my soul and helped me to keep pure
The thoughts that surged within me. As I mingle with the throng
The echo of that voice of hers helps me to hate the wrong
And choose the right, when there's a choice—
No boy forgets his Mother's voice.

I'll never see another smile like Mother's smile, I know;
'Twas Mother's smile put pluck in me, enheart'ning me to go
The stony road when there the path of duty clearly lay.
That smile told me that Mother staked her faith on me; each day
That image lingers, Mother's smile—
'Tis that, my friend, makes life worth while.

I'll never know another prayer like Mother's prayer for me;
I'm sure that when to God she went to plead on bended knee,
That Heaven's business paused awhile, and angels listened there
And chorused "Hallelujah" when they heard my Mother's prayer.
The Heavens smiled with radiant joy
When Mother prayed to save her boy.

My Mother's hand whose healing touch could smooth out all my pain;
My Mother's voice—through boyhood's days it calls to me again;
Her smile that scattered sunshine 'mongst the folks who saw her face;
That prayer of hers ascending to the inner throne of grace—
These treasures in my memory
Are riches Mother leaves to me.

Stabilizing Public Sentiment For Prohibition in Colorado

Adrianna Hungerford, State President

For two forenoons recently the senate chamber of the state house in Denver, Colorado, rang with total abstinence, prohibition and law enforcement facts and arguments. The occasion was the state oratorical contest for eighth-graders; twenty-seven counties were represented.

The state superintendent of public instruction, Miss Katherine L. Craig, sent out the rules and topics for the contest. There were local and county contests, and the winners in the latter were eligible to the state contest. The topics were: "Self-Control;" "Total Abstinence;" "The Volstead Act;" "Frances E. Willard;" "The War and Prohibition;" "The Relation of Industry to Prohibition;" "Does Prohibition Prohibit?" "Prohibition Through Education."

The preparation made by the contestants, and the spirit with which most of them delivered their orations, were creditable, and indicated that the speakers had grasped the vital importance of the subjects discussed. Prohibition was upheld, honorable mention made of the work of the W. C. T. U., and Frances E. Willard proclaimed the "uncrowned Queen of America." Russell Smith, an eleven-year-old boy from a small mining camp in the mountains, won first place and on his return home was greeted by the assembled population.

The Lions Club of Denver entertained the contestants at a theater party, an automobile ride and a luncheon, where the first and second prize winners with their orations "took the men off their feet." Two members of the Lions Club served on the committee of judges of which the state president was chairman. Teachers and pupils, by appealing to state headquarters for literature, recognized the aid the W. C. T. U. can give. This contest has had a state-wide influence and helped to stabilize public sentiment for prohibition.

Stickers

If the efforts of reformers are to be successful, their work must not be done spasmodically in the enthusiasm of the moment. The destructive forces are working twenty-four hours per day, three hundred and sixty-five days per annum. The reformers must become "stickers" to their job. The committee for the World's W. C. T. U. convention have discovered a method by which every temperance worker may become a twenty-four hour worker for the cause. Just enclose $3.00 for a thousand or 50 cents for a hundred and say "Stickers," to

In sending money to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to THE UNION SIGNAL, or the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, please either send a draft on Chicago or New York, a postoffice money order, or add five cents to pay cost of exchange on checks or drafts on local banks. Cashier's or certified checks are not exempt from this charge, which is made necessary by the ruling of the Chicago Clearing House, through which all checks sent to us pass for collection.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. REBECCA K. BYLES of Central union, Denver, Colorado. In Pennsylvania, twenty years ago, Mrs. Byles served as president of Mercer county; later, as president of Central union, Denver, which was organized by Frances E. Willard, she succeeded in building it into the largest in the state. She arranged for W. C. T. U. speakers in church societies when the organization was not popular; instituted the annual legislative breakfast; helped in all campaigns for prohibition in Denver and Colorado. Mrs. Byles also held the office of state superintendent of Soldiers and Sailors, and recently had charge of Fairs and Exhibits. For years her name appeared on the honor roll of solicitors for THE UNION SIGNAL.

MRS. MARTHA B. KEIGHLEY of Vineland, New Jersey. For nearly forty years a member of the Vineland W. C. T. U., and for nearly sixteen years its president, she was always intensely interested in all departments of the organization. Her beautiful home was always open to guests, many who were prominent in the cause of temperance finding a hearty welcome there, among them national as well as state W. C. T. U. officers. Mrs. Keighley was also an active worker in the church, a member of the board of lady visitors of the Vineland Training School for Feeble Minded Children, a trustee of the Historical Society, interested in all that has to do with the achievement and uplift of humanity and a liberal giver of financial support as well. On her eightieth birthday anniversary she was made a life member of the W. C. T. U. by the local union. She will be greatly missed, but has fought the good fight, and her works will follow her.

MRS. CHRISTENA DANN, charter member of the Rouses Point (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. An efficient, as well as an always faithful worker, she will be greatly missed by her comrades.

REV. A. J. HUGHES, honorary member of the Acworth (Georgia) W. C. T. U. When the cause was unpopular, he bravely stood in the forefront and with untiring zeal continued writing and speaking for prohibition until the day of his home going. No man in Georgia, it is said, deserves more credit for creating sentiment for temperance, or to bring state-wide prohibition. His life was a blessing to the state.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Religion and the College Student

Clyde Dwight, State Superintendent of Evangelistic Work for the Y. P. B., Alfred University, N. Y.

If I were asked to give from observation the average college student's attitude toward religion, you might disagree with me. I have been forced to believe that the college student has a deep religious vein. My work has been with men that represent all types of the college-bred. There is always a tendency to judge persons by their outward expression and our conception or interpretation of religion. It is wise to consider the student's training, personality and thought background.

While in the college office a few weeks ago, a letter of one of the student's parents was brought to my attention. Everything but the religious welfare was in the background. The parent was willing to sacrifice all for this sacred part of the student's life.

The department of English has a habit of asking the freshmen to write their autobiographies as a class assignment. This information, unknown to the freshmen, is tabulated for future reference. A large per cent mentioned their church relations as one of the big things of their lives.

While conducting Bible studies among the students under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., we found it necessary to learn what was the psychology and thought background of our pupils. To the question, what makes a real man, about twenty-two qualities were named, which for convenience were classified under six heads in order of their frequency. These attributes were written up on individual cards without signatures in order to obtain uninfluenced results. The list is as follows: (1) Truthfulness; (2) Strength of Character; (3) High Ideals; (4) Kindness; (5) Christian Spirit; (6) Politeness.

I realize that I have merely raised the questions of whether religion plays an important part in the life of the college student and the interpretation which the student may have. There is not space in this article to classify the student thought or give the reaction to college life. The means of expression, the evolution in the material and spiritual world would be interesting to work up in some other article.

In concluding, there is a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox that is very typical of student thought along the line of kindness, which runs as follows:

"So many Gods, so many creeds;
So many ways that wind and wind;
While just the art of being kind
Is all the sad world needs."

The Onward March Along the Y. P. B. Highway

Fisk University, Tennessee, has just closed a successful Y. P. B. membership campaign. The enrollment was increased from 48 to 87.

Pennsylvania reports thirty new Y. P. B.'s organized since the state W. C. T. U. convention in October.

Miss Dorothy Wheale spent two weeks in Delaware where, as a part of her work, she organized two new Branches.

As a result of two weeks in Iowa, Mrs. Fannie A. Drummond, national field worker, secured 270 Y. P. B. pledges and organized several Branches. A visit to Penn College was greatly enjoyed by the students, who responded to the appeal for enlistment in our cause.

Mrs. Maude Perkins will visit five of the state Y. P. B. conventions in June and July. She will spend ten days in Florida. June 26-27 will be given to the Ohio convention at Toledo; June 28-29 to the Pennsylvania convention at DuBois; July 1-2 to Delaware; and July 4-6 to the New York convention at Cook Academy, Montour Falls.

An invitation has been given Miss Anna Gordon to visit several of these conventions and it is hoped that the young people may enjoy the presence of the National W. C. T. U. president.

The Frances Willard union of Salt Lake City, Utah, reports fine uplift as the result of three days' work by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary. She spoke at the assembly hour at the West high school, before 1,200 students, and after an informal reception and luncheon, delivered a talk on W. C. T. U. methods. On Sunday she addressed three different churches, and a young people's meeting, all interested audiences. Her delightful personality and convincing statements encouraged members already enrolled and was the means. of adding from 20 to 25 new members.

About sixty young people gathered at the Woman's Community building in Ithaca, N. Y., recently, for the spring rally of the Young People's Branch of Tompkins county, Miss Maud Pratt, county general secretary, presiding. After a song and devotional service, the question, "Why Sign the Triple Pledge," was ably answered by Mrs. Margaret Mapes, and "Why Read THE UNION SIGNAL?" in the absence of Mrs. Zella Baker, by Mrs. Mary B. Wood, state corresponding secretary and president of the Ithaca W. C. T. U. Mrs. Anna Holmes told of the value of the Young People's Branch. A debate on the question, "Resolved, that men did more than women to secure the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment," caused considerable merriment. An interesting blackboard talk was given by the president of the state federation of the Y. P. B., P. L. Dunn, who spoke on "Essentials of a Model Meeting." The program of the afternoon was brought to a close in a forum, the presidents of the local unions presenting their views on the relation of the Y. P. B. to the W. C. T. U. The last speaker, Mrs. Mary B. Wood, gave a helpful resumé, and a charge to the young people on present day opportunities. A speaking contest, in which representatives from several Branches presented original three-minute speeches on law enforce-

Law Enforcement in West Washington Vigorous and Full of Vim

Mary E. Brown, President West Washington W .C. T. U.

West Washington W. C. T. U. has, during 1922, been privileged to have the services of two national workers. Rev. Lida M. Herrick, organizer and lecturer, gave several months to special work in the schools, also general W. C. T. U. activities. Several new unions, new members, weak unions strengthened and others started on the way to organization, all stand to her credit. Her efforts have been appreciated.

Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary, sent out by "Mother National" to conduct membership conferences in the states of the northwest, spent twelve days with us. Seven conferences, two special meetings, several high schools and one mid-year institute were addressed by her. Interest was deepened, and the vital need for active pre-election work emphasized. Plans for membership campaigns were also outlined and the necessity of reaching and educating the young people made plain. Mrs. Perkins' presence and work were greatly appreciated and those who enjoyed the opportunity of hearing her are anxious to have her return.

In spite of much illness during the winter and spring, many local institutes have been held. Enforcement of the prohibitory law is one of the vital interests of the state because of our proximity to British Columbia and our vast coast line. The faithful women continue to render valuable assistance to both state and Federal officers. Headquarters serves as a sort of a clearing-house for reports from all over the state, passing them on to the respective officers.

Our intensive membership campaign has been postponed to May 7-26 because of much illness, lateness of the membership conferences, and other reasons, but plans are under way and substantial gains are expected.

Law Enforcement Activities Worthy of Note

Law enforcement activities of the Federal prohibition director for the state of Washington have been carried forward so quietly that some have questioned whether anything of value was being accomplished, but those privileged to know the facts realize that this lack of publicity does not, by any means, indicate idleness or inefficiency, but rather, a wise withholding of some of the plans by which the larger operations of the "booze runners" are circumvented. The enforcement officers of the northwest, municipal, state and Federal, have organized with sub-groups in all cities and they meet regularly to discuss and formulate scientific, practical plans for the work, thus securing necessary unity and co-operation.

Millard T. Hartson, collector of internal revenue, and Thomas P. Revelle, U. S. district attorney, are doing all in their power to assist the prohibition director in his arduous task. Probably no state in the Union has a more earnest, conscientious trio of Federal officials endeavoring, in co-operation, to do their full duty in connection with the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Mr. Roy C. Lyle, prohibition director, believes that ninety per cent of the whisky smuggled from British Columbia into the state of Washington is first shipped into the province from the United States, ostensibly for legitimate purposes, then smuggled back for bootlegging activities. Canada uses practically no imported alcohol, so the vast quantities which have been going across the border from the United States evidently have not been for consumption there. Conferences with officials in British Columbia have resulted in the issuance of an order by U. S. Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes, forbidding the sending of whisky from the United States into Canada without the "O. K." of Washington's state director, Roy C. Lyle. This is believed to be a most far-reaching and helpful ruling and should result in the cutting off of most of the supplies which have been run into Washington by fast launch and automobile.

It is stated that the wholesale liquor houses in British Columbia are being attacked by both wet and dry sympathizers to an extent which Mr. Lyle believes makes it a question of but a short time when their operations will be greatly restricted or they will be forced out of business altogether. To this end, both Provincial and Federal officers are agitating and urging restrictions and taxations.

A special campaign against "soft drink" places, and wines purchased for ostensible use in Jewish tabernacle services, is quietly under way in the cities of the state. Mr. John Hazeltine, prohibition chief for the northwest states, and Mr. Lyle, are trying to educate the public as to the conditions under which moonshine is manufactured. Their enjoyment is undisguised as they tell of the gnats, flies, rags and rats, often found in the vats from which the "shine" is distilled, but the amusement vanishes when reference is made to the metallic poisons which also find their way into it from the coils of the still. They are anxious that the public shall know these facts, nauseating though they be.

As the officers of Canada and the United States are striving to cut off the supplies smuggled into Washington and the enforcement officers of the state to look after the moonshine and bootleg gentry, we feel confident that we shall soon climb to one hundred per cent enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The Badge of White Ribbon

John M. Doan

There are splendid decorations
Worn in many foreign lands,
Won by feats of martial valor
And bestowed by royal hands.
There are many mystic orders
With regalia, silk and gold,
Tracing back their hoary legends
To the distant days of old.
Not one stands for higher purpose,
Not one emblem near so fair,
As the bow of snowy ribbon
That my mother used to wear.

'Twas a badge of moral courage,
Of ideals, high and grand,
And the bearer pledged to serving
"God and Home and Native Land."
Ah! the battles fierce and many,
And the martyrs, not a few,
Fell upon that field of glory
Ere the prophets' dream came true.
'Twas indeed a soldier's chevron,
'Twas indeed a Croix de Guerre,
Was that bow of snow-white ribbon
That my mother used to wear.

Far across the widening chasm
Of the intervening years,
Comes the memory of that ribbon
Jeweled with a mother's tears.
Like some beacon, bright, unfailing,
It has lighted up the road;
It restrained my feet from wand'ring,
It has kept me close to God.
Now—a silver chain—it binds me,
And each link a mother's prayer,
Is the memory of that ribbon
That my mother used to wear.

Mr. Guthmann chose for his theme, "Our Companionship with Books," and cited numerous instances where the young people from various walks of life had, through the medium of home and spare-time study of worth-while books risen to eminent positions in their respective fields.

Resolution Passed by Shreveport (La.) Rotary Club

Whereas, there can be no bootlegger without patrons, and

Whereas, every citizen that patronizes any manufacturer and seller of intoxicants in any form or manner is an abettor of such violations of the prohibition laws of our country and is guilty of thwarting the intent and purpose of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States and should be punished accordingly, therefore

Be it resolved, that this Rotary Club with its entire individual membership subscribes itself to the above statements as being facts, and places itself upon record with this resolve to assist the officers in this vicinity and elsewhere where opportunity is had, to enforce the prohibition laws rigidly and effectively until such laws are annulled or proven to be worthy of a permanent place with all other good laws.

God thought to give the sweetest thing
In His Almighty power
To Earth; and deeply pondering
What it should be, one hour
In fondest joy, and love of heart
Outweighing every other
He moved the gates of heaven apart,
And gave to Earth a mother.

Philadelphia Has Prospered Under Prohibition

The other week a great law enforcement rally was held in Philadelphia. Thousands of citizens crowded into the Academy of Music and voiced their enthusiasm for the prohibition law and good laws, in general. Among the speakers was Joseph M. Steele, president of the Law Enforcement League of the city, who, according to press reports, dealt with the local conditions under prohibition as follows:

"Recently a lot of dust has been thrown in the eyes of the people. The Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, engendered the strenuous opposition of all engaged in the liquor business.

"Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, because of their recognized leadership, have been made the battleground of the bootleggers in an attempt to make it appear that the people demand a restoration of rum. It is the most futile fiction ever conceived.

"The benefits which have accrued to our city since the enactment of the prohibition law include a much lower death rate, a greater purchasing power, increased home buying, building association membership and savings bank accounts, a marked decrease in the number of inmates of almshouses and jails and a general increase of happiness among our citizens.

"To show the real state of the public mind and to encourage the law enforcement officers, city, state and national, in the full performance of their duty, the Law Enforcement League was organized. The eagerness with which thousands and thousands of citizens have signed our membership cards is a robust refutation of the claim that a great majority desire the return of liquor."

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, he is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Pitying her, he tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again.)

CHAPTER XIV.

The Fortescues and their visitors were to dine at the chaplain's next evening. Mrs. Mortimer felt eager to meet him and his wife, and was filled with the desire to find friends for Angela who should be a comfort and protection to her and to whom she could go for counsel.

She had heard an extremely fine sermon from the Padre on Christmas-day, and felt that he was a good and reliable man. She determined to confide in him, if she found him to be what she imagined. Therefore, out of two invitations to dinner which had reached them for that evening, she asked that this one from the chaplain's wife should be accepted.

Mr. Selwyn, the Padre Sahib, was a senior chaplain, in receipt of good pay. His bungalow was a large and well-appointed one. His wife was much younger than himself, and was a frivolous little woman who entered into all the gaieties of the station.

It was a small dinner party, eight in all. As they entered the drawing-room, Angela started back and said, "Oh!" in a voice of surprise.

Two young men faced them, on either side of Mrs. Selwyn. One was standing leaning down towards her in conversation. It was Bertram Harford. He had not seen Angela, but she recognized him in an instant. Her face flushed and her eyes brightened, and a spring of joy bubbled up in her heart. Introductions were made, and the two claimed previous acquaintance quite naturally.

Angela, as a recent bride and wife of the Deputy Commissioner, was taken in to dinner by Mr. Selwyn. Harford sat opposite to her. She scanned his face when he was occupied with his neighbor, and came to the conclusion that he did not look as well as when they parted on board ship.

"Mr. Harford is a new comer; he has been transferred here to fill the place of Mr. Tilden, who has gone on furlough," said the Padre.

Angela glanced at him with a look of pleased surprise.

"He will be a great addition to Seraneb society."

"You think so?"

"Yes, and a great help to you in your work."

"How do you mean?"

"He is so good and self-denying, he wants to help everyone," she said in a low voice. Harford was busy talking, and did not hear this. He noticed, however, that Angela refused the wine offered, and drank water, and the light of satisfaction gleamed in his eyes. When the champagne appeared, Mr. Selwyn, looking at Angela's glass, which though filled, remained untouched, said,

"Mrs. Fortescue, I want you to taste this; it is a particular vintage sent me from France, said to be unique of its kind."

"Thanks, but I do not drink champagne."

"But just to please me; I want your verdict; ladies have a fine taste in wine."

Angela looked round at him entreatingly; her color faded.

"I am sure it will do you good; you have touched nothing yet."

Fortescue, who was next but one, said, "Drink it, Angela, you are looking pale!"

She gave him a glance of reproach.

The scent of the wine called to her, she longed to drink it. Unwilling to appear conspicuous, she lifted the glass to her lips and tasted it. Suddenly the color rushed in a flood over face and neck, and she set it down with a gesture of disgust.

"What is wrong; is it not good?" asked her host.

She leaned towards him, and said in an excited whisper, "Mr. Selwyn, the wine is all right, it is myself that I am disgusted with! I know this delicious drink is a poison to me, yet I am so very weak, and so much afraid of the opinion of others, that I drink at your invitation, against my conscience, and against my mind and heart, yes, against my reputation!"

He was appalled by her words, and murmured something apologetically.

"Don't apologize! hate me! despise me! make me wince! It is the kindest action on your part." She went on in a louder key, and clasped her hands in a passion of entreaty, drawing quick, deep breaths.

"You are surprised; you do not know what this temptation is to me. Tell me, if you had a friend walking with you, and he was on the edge of a precipice, would you push him over?"

"How can you ask?"

"Well, that is what you moderate drinkers are doing. You offer drink to men and women, some of whom have the awful taint of inherited inebriety, and morally you push them over the precipice to the edge of which they are clinging, and they sink and sink until lost."

"Mrs. Fortescue, you appall me."

"It is true, true, true! You do it in hospitality, in kindness—it is dire cruelty. You drink good health in that which brings bad health. Oh, the idiotic customs of our English people!"

She laughed and went on in the same concentrated tone of bitterness:

"I went to a wedding the other day, a big affair, crowds! It was hot and dusty; there was nothing provided for the guests but champagne: not a drop of water, nor tea, nor coffee, nor lemonade. I was parched with thirst; it was alcohol or nothing." She went on more quietly, "Mr. Selwyn, you as a Padre could do much to alter these customs—why do you not?"

By this time the whole table, aware of some electric emotion, were silent, listening to Angela. Her husband looked deeply annoyed, and bit his lips. Her mother leaned forward, eagerly gazing at her daughter. Harford sat quiet, the look of satisfaction deepening in his eyes.

Angela became aware of the attention concentrated on herself. With an effort she regained self-possession, and said to Mr. Selwyn, "Don't trouble to answer my question now; tell me afterward what you think."

Conversation reverted to its conventional flow, but all felt a sense of discomfort. As the ladies rose to go, she caught Harford's eyes fixed on her with approbation.

Her heart leaped. "He is glad," she said to herself, and this comforted her for the look of annoyance and wounded vanity from her husband.

When the men came in, Harford drew to Angela's side with a book, and showing it to her, said quietly, "Bravo, Mrs Fortescue; you maintained your position."

She thanked him sadly, feeling lo and weary after her recent excitemen and apprehensive of her husband's di pleasure.

"Tell me about yourself. What ha you been doing? Do you like India?"

"To the last question, Yes; to the fir —doing the ordinary work of an a sistant Civil Servant in a small Indi station. I am here for six months more."

"I am so glad." She said this with affected pleasure, and his heart went c with pity, for he saw she was thoroughly happy. The lovely girl of t voyage had altered, the freshness a innocent look had gone. But she w very beautiful, and there was a cert pathos in her appealing face.

He gazed down at her as she sat w head somewhat averted, unconsciou admiring the curve of her slender n where its soft whiteness disappea from view beneath the billowy chif of her dress.

The moment they were alone, For cue said roughly to Angela, "Wha a scene you made at the dinner tal ! Kindly abstain from such in the futu ; you lower me in the eyes of the stati "

"Forgive me, Frank; I could not l p it."

She pondered, nevertheless, on e strange egoism of the man who thou at of himself first in every situation of life.

The brief Christmas rains which e- fresh the dry brightness of the In an winter were over when Fortescue n- nounced one morning at breakfast at his camp life must begin.

"I am under Government orders t go on tour for several months each year nd this is the most favorable time, b re the heat begins."

"What is your work?" inquired M rti- mer.

"I have a district under my sup vi- sion; I visit villages and towns, exa ine revenue questions, with subordinat of- ficials; hear complaints; receive eti- tions; cast an eye on education ind public works, and act as judicia of- ficer."

"You are, in fact, the Govern of your district."

"Yes, and judge. A district officer is responsible for about a million people. Well, Angela, will you and your mother and Mr. Mortimer join me? If so, we will take Divan Singh and the servants."

"We must leave India at the end of February and we wish to visit a few places first," replied Mr. Mortimer, "but I for one would like to experience camp life in India."

"Yes, let us all go," said Mrs. Mortimer, looking at her daughter, who with sad eyes was regarding her mother eagerly. "We shall be more together, and less interrupted by festivities, shall we not?"

"Certainly; but don't think you will have to rough it. We can make you as comfortable as in this bungalow. We Indian officials are compelled to give ourselves some of the comforts of home in our tents, for we reside in them for months and do serious work. We have for the sake of efficiency to avoid exposing ourselves to privations and discomforts!"

Fortescue said this with his air of importance.

Preparations were begun at once, and at the end of the week they were ensconced in two fine large tents. A good tent is made with an inner and outer covering, for one is not enough to protect from the fierce Indian sun. It is hung inside with curtains of fine embroidered stuffs and furnished with every comfort in the way of chairs and writing tables, bedsteads and mosquito curtains, dressing table and mirror, folding chests of drawers, and each person has his properly equipped bath-room with zinc tubs. The official has his office with his clerk, his typist, his copyist and transcriber, his records and his letter files, his documents and books of reference.

What makes all this possible is the abundance of cheap transit power, available in man and beast. When you travel in the East you realize the cheapness of the human creature, and the animals at command are only slightly dearer. The horse, the camel, and even the elephant, are to be had when required. When a Deputy Commissioner travels, the headman of the next village is informed that so many men, and so many animals, and so much food, will be needed, and they are forthcoming, and the Government settles the bill. The money is paid through native officials and does not always reach the right people, such is the squeezing system common to India.

It was a merry, happy party that assembled round the dinner-table that first day in camp. The meal was served with the usual accompaniments of fine linen, glass and silver. Orders that flowers sent by special messenger from the bungalow should reach them each day, gave the usual floral decorations to the table. Divan Singh and bearers in spotless white waited upon the party. Little wine was drunk, Fortescue alone taking it. Angela had not touched any since her mother's revelation and her husband had not appeared to notice her refusal. One heart was rejoicing, and that was Divan Singh's, as he saw the Mem Sahiba's glass unfilled night after night. He told himself that the Great God in Heaven had heard his prayers.

One morning, when the dew clung to the scant grass, and a tender blue haze softened the flat yellow distance that was bounded by thin lines of mango trees, with here and there a stately toddy-palm, Angela, in her early stroll, came upon Divan Singh stooping over a recumbent figure, and expostulating in loud tones. On nearer approach, she saw it was her khansama (cook), who lay upon the ground in an apparently semi-conscious condition.

"What is the matter? Is he ill?" she asked of Divan Singh.

"Huzoor!" he replied, salaaming; "this Shib Das very much drunk. Him drink sharab all night!"

Angela looked with repugnance at the drunkard who rolled his head from side to side, and mumbled "Wah! wah!' in a senseless way.

Snddenly a slender figure in red trousers, draped over face and shoalders in a dirty white chuddar, darted from the servants' quarters, flung herself on the ground beside the man, and began pounding him vigorously.

"Son of a pig, wake up! wake up! The Mem Sahib is here: she sees thy shame and pollution. Thou wilt starve for thy sins! Thy name is a reproach on this earth, because thou drinkest the wicked water of the Jesus religion!"

Angela was horrified. "What does she mean by the 'Jesus religion'?"

"She speaks thus because her husband learned to drink strong wine from his former master, who gave it to him." Then turning to the woman he said, "Chup rao (be quiet), Sunnia; go, shameless woman."

"I will not go, Mem Sahiba, protector of the poor; thy slave has not one pice to buy a meal for the children; they starve."

"She has no food, does she say, Divan?"

"Yes, Huzoor, all the wages are gone for drink!"

"Poor creatures! There is a rupee, Sunnia! Get food, and don't let your husband touch the money." Then turning to Divan she said, with a reproachful look, "Surely you can protect him from this temptation. You have authority over the servants."

"Mem Sahiba, I try, try, try, all the time; for a month he gives sharab up, then breaks out again. Thy servant must hire a new khansama, or the presence will have no breakfast."

"But he is a Mohammedan, I was told, and they do not drink; it is against their religion."

"True, Huzoor! but he is mad for it, and takes it though he knows he is going to hell, and his wife's heart breaks, and his children starve."

Angela moved away, feeling helpless and sad. Another victim of alcohol! She knew in the depths of her heart that she had the same taste as this degraded being. He was the first drunken wretch she had seen in India, and she felt she could not even touch him with her dainty shoe, so loathsome he seemed to her. A panic seized her. "What if I gave way to temptation! How much better should I be?"

She sought her mother. "Mother, don't leave me, will you?"

"What do you mean, dear?"

"I'm afraid if you leave me, I cannot persevere in my abstinence from alcohol."

"My child, do not say so; you are growing stronger and able to stand alone. We must go, for your husband cannot and does not wish to make a home for us with you. Before we leave, we will ask Dr. Kathleen Scott to be a friend to you. But, my child, there is a friend to whom you can always go. Your Father in Heaven, He will strengthen and help you in your time of need."

"Oh, Mother, pray now that I may be able to resist this temptation! The loathsomeness of it is so terrible. I have just seen our khansama dead drunk, and it has come to me that some day I may be like that!"

"God forbid, my dear child! Cheer up, and put your faith in God!"

"If only Frank were different, but he is not a help to me! Mother, he promised to love, honor and cherish me. I think he loves himself, not me!"

"Hush, dearest, he is your husband for better, for worse; if you think it is for worse, you have still to abide by him, you know."

"Ah, Mother! how much I have learned of life lately! How I wish I could be your little girl again!"

Mrs. Mortimer sighed, but did not reply.

Keep Up the Good Work!

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

If space allowed, we would be delighted to publish the names of all the local unions who have one hundred per cent Trio Teams. The number keeps increasing, and we are anticipating some fine day a heavy mail, reporting many counties ready to go on the county Honor Roll, and then in the next week's paper will appear a whole column, perhaps, two, of one hundred per cent Trio Team Counties. Did we hear someone ask if we were dreaming? Not a bit. It will be like the buds working so quietly that we are surprised when some morning we wake up to find a tree white with blossoms.

Minnesota, District No. 12, sent in three counties at one time. Other districts can do the same, and will! Keep up the good work!

WORDS OF APPRECIATION

I have never missed a copy of THE UNION SIGNAL for over 37 years.

AGNES YOUNG,
Eskridge, Kans.

I so much enjoy and value our UNION SIGNAL which I have taken for many years, and do want to assure you of my appreciation and thanks for all your painstaking labor these many years to make it all it has been, and is, more and more, to our great and blessed organization for "God, and Home and Everyland."

Mrs. Charlotte T. Hill,
Williamsburg, Mass.

THE UNION SIGNAL has the most complete practical resumé of vital political facts of any paper I read.

Mrs. M. J. Sweet,
126 Pasadena Ave.,
Highland Park, Mich.

There are four UNION SIGNALS taken by four officers of our union—3 weekly and 1 monthly. We hope to add more to the list and also to secure a number of subscriptions to the YOUNG CRUSADER. We hope to do more along the line of work with children and young people during the coming year.

Grace A. Adams,
Beeville, Texas.

I am already a subscriber and the enclosed subscriptions complete the Trio Team of the Loyal W. C. T. U. I cannot understand how any W. C. T. U. member can do without our UNION SIGNAL. When I am told that things are worse now than before we had prohibition (and you know there are people who say that whether or not they believe it) I simply hand them one of my UNION SIGNALS and tell them to "Read that".

Mrs. Emma Heaslett,
Loyal, Wis.

I am lost, simply lost, without THE UNION SIGNAL. I am responsible for our W. C. T. U. column in the local paper. I certainly must have the paper and that right soon, because I cannot be responsible for an authentic up-to-date temperance column without it.

Yours with thankfulness that we have THE UNION SIGNAL,

Mrs. Hattie C. Whipple,
Cornell, Wis.

Prohibition is a failure, of course. It isn't enforced. You've heard that often enough so that if you don't believe it you must be hard to convince. Nevertheless, would you care to be a bootlegger right now if you were seeking a safe and steadily remunerative occupation? Come to think of it, it is, for a fact, the opponents of prohibition rather than the supporters who are proclaiming the failure in enforcement. Why should they worry if the thing isn't working?—Palo Alto (Calif.) Times.

Effects of Alcohol on Performance in Sport Activities

In the Munchener Medizinische Wochenschrift (Munich) for February 3, 1922, Herxheimer discusses the effect of alcohol on the functions of the body in general and more particularly in connection with sport activities. Experiments on thirty-one athletes showed that the ingestion of small quantities of alcohol (7 gm. of 96 per cent alcohol, diluted) four to six minutes before the men entered upon 100 meter runs and 100 meter swims reduced their performance considerably. Runners who received no alcohol ran the course in about two-tenths of a second less than those to whom the dose of alcohol was given. The results for the swimmers who were given no alcohol were also correspondingly better. This corresponded to a gain of 2 meters in the course.

Quiz: Organized Mother-Love

1. What, according to settlement workers, has prohibition accomplished in Chicago?
2. What is the Prohibition Unit? Name the subdivisions of the field forces.
3. What are some of the duties of the inspectors? Of the legal division?
4. Discuss the appropriateness of Mother's Day being also W. C. T. U. Membership Day.
5. Briefly tell the stories of membership gains in Columbus (Ga.) and other places, and discuss the adaptation of some of the plans for your own union.
6. What six reasons are given by women in their acceptance of invitations to join the W. C. T. U.?
7. When can the W. C. T. U. and other temperance organizations safely cease to function?
8. With what defeats are bootleggers meeting in Philadelphia?
9. How has public sentiment for prohibition been promoted in Colorado by the W. C. T. U. and the schools?
10. What has been accomplished for law enforcement in West Washington?

POPULARIZING PROHIBITION IN CHINA

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

WORK OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL SOCIAL HYGIENE BOARD SHOULD BE CONTINUED—HOUSE PASSES SOLDIER HOSPITAL BILL—WINE AND BEER AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION PROPOSED IN HOUSE—CHINA RATIFIES PACTS OF ARMS PARLEY—GREAT SAVING UNDER BUDGET SYSTEM—BILLS TO PROMOTE PHYSICAL EDUCATION INTRODUCED IN CONGRESS — TWO WOMEN NOMINEES FOR CONGRESS

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Work of Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board Should be Continued

Representative Kahn of California has introduced a bill in the House—H. R. 11490—to enlarge the powers and duties of the United States Department of Justice so as to enable that department to take over the law enforcement and protective work against prostitution near military and naval stations. This work is now being done by the United States Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, of which our own Dr. Valeria Parker is executive secretary. Women's organizations endorse this transfer.

The bill carries an appropriation of $325,000, which is an increase over the present appropriation, because the protection the Board is now giving the armed forces in the continental United States, would be extended to cover similar stations in the insular possessions and the Panama Canal Zone.

The bill also provides protection for ex-soldiers and sailors stationed in hospitals and elsewhere who are not protected under the present Board.

Appeal to your House members to vote for support of this bill.

China Ratifies Pacts of Arms Parley, Being First to Follow United States

The Chinese government has ratified the Washington Conference treaties to which China was signatory and the Shantung treaty negotiated during the Conference with Japan, according to advices which have been received by the Chinese Legation here. The Conference treaties to which China was signatory are the general Chinese policies pact and the convention on Chinese customs.

The ratification by China, accomplished by presidential order, is the first by any of the foreign powers which participated in the Washington Conference.

Honest Trade Label Decision

The United States Supreme Court decision, rendered recently in the case brought by the government to compel manufacturers to use labels on their goods that will not convey to the consumer an erroneous idea of the materials entering into the articles he has purchased, is a great victory for the honest trade label. This decision by the highest tribunal upholds a great principle of business.

Great Saving Made Under Budget System

Director of the Budget Dawes, in his report to Congress comparing expenditures of the past and present fiscal years, shows achievements in economy of $1,600,000,000 under the budget system. Under the new system, which counts for efficiency, the director points to possibilities for large savings.

Service Men Preferred

The President of the United States issued an executive order May 10, 1921, creating an opportunity for the five per cent preference to former service men in civil service examinations for the eligibility list for appointment as postmasters. Postmaster General Work now announces that since the order carrying the preference clause was issued six hundred former service men have been appointed.

House Passes Hospital Bill

The $17,000,000 Soldier Hospital Bill, making immediately available $12,000,000 for beginning construction of institutions in twelve of the fourteen veteran bureau districts, was passed recently by the House. Reported by Chairman Madden of the Appropriations Committee, the measure was put through by unanimous vote. It now goes to the Senate.

Appeal to the President For Physical Education

Following the realization that one out of every four Americans drafted for service in the world war was illiterate, that 75 per cent of the boys on arrival in camp were found to have physical defects that might have been prevented, and that surveys regarding health conditions of school children reveal that not more than 25 per cent of them are physically fit, many bills to promote education, health and Americanization have been introduced in both houses of Congress.

The Fess-Capper Bill, to promote physical education, is one of these. It is a measure which has the support of many national organizations, as is proven by the large delegation which waited upon the President of the United States this week. Members of the party were introduced by Brigadier General Charles E. Sawyer, family physician of the President. The spokesman for the delegation, Gustavus T. Kirby of the Playground Association of America, expressed great appreciation of the interest already manifested by the President and appealed for his continued support to make possible a healthy nation through physical education in the public schools. The President in replying said that they could count on his assistance, as the matter was very close to his heart.

Representatives of the following organizations were present: The Woman's Relief Corps, International Y. M. C. A., Child Conservation League of America, The General Federation of Women's Clubs, Boy Scouts of America, The American Social Hygiene Association of America, The National Community Service, The American Association of University Women, The Council of Jewish Women, The National Collegiate Athletic Association, The College Physical Directors' Society, The American Physical Education Association, The Amateur Athletic Union, The American Gymnastic Union, The National Tuberculosis Association, The American Nurses' Association, the National Memorial Physical Betterment Bureau. The National Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, Girl Scouts of America, Daughters of the American Revolution, National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, The American Federation of Labor and The National Association of Rotary Clubs.

Wine and Beer Amendment to Constitution Proposed in House

Two joint resolutions amending the Constitution, both designed to legalize light wines and beer, and a bill providing in effect for submission of the same question to a referendum vote, have been introduced in the House by Representative Ansorge of New York.

One resolution proposes the addition of a new section to the Eighteenth Amendment which would expressly provide that the words, "intoxicating liquor," do not include 2.75 per cent beer.

The other proposed amendment would permit of the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer under government regulation and control, while another section would provide that a state legislature shall not vote on the question until the people of the state have passed on the members of that legislature at an election.

Representative Hill of Maryland has introduced a bill to permit the manufacture of 2.75 per cent beer and cider in any Congressional district by a referendum vote, both liquors to be subject to a tax of twenty cents a gallon.

Congressman Hill's proposition is both impracticable and unconstitutional. The only question that is "referred to the people" of the Congressional district is the election of a Congressman who is by vote of the people sent to Congress to represent that district.

Petitions signed by 2,689 persons of Missouri asking for modification of the national prohibition act were presented this week to the House by Representative Kahn of California. These wet gestures in Congress emphasize the need of renewed activity on the part of white ribboners.

No Hope For Immediate Adjournment of Congress

Optimists who predicted a few months ago an adjournment of Congress by July 1 must revise their prognostications. With sighs of regret, the busy solons now talk of September 1 as a more likely date for the expiration of the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

The House may be able to have three-day adjournments, but the Senate, which reached the third of the 438 pages of the Tariff bill yesterday, will doubtless stay on the job.

Uncle Sam Busy With Flower Gardens

Uncle Sam is busy planting beautiful posies in his gardens in Washington. For many years, visitors to the national capital have marveled at the parks and circles at the intersection of many of the principal streets and at the flower gardens which adorned them. All of these parks and circles and "government reservations" are under the administration of an officer in the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, Lieutenant Colonel Clarence O. Sherill. It is under his general direction that the work is done. The plants come from the President's own greenhouses—known as the "propagating gardens," the principal duty of which is to keep the White House supplied with flowers and to have charge of the floral decorations for all White House functions.

There are 150 or more flower beds to be planted annually. Fifty of these now are abloom with vivid coloring from spring bulbs.

Roses do not wait for June in Washington, but bloom in April and May. Secretary of Agriculture Wallace is delighting fellow members of the Cabinet by placing on their desks glorious bunches of American Beauty roses grown in the Department of Agriculture conservatories. The White House roses, too, are particularly beautiful at this season. Mrs. Harding sees to it that every room in the White House and Executive offices is kept filled with their loveliness and fragrance.

Two Women Nominees For Congress

In the primary elections which have already been held in South Dakota, Indiana, and Illinois, two women have been nominated for Congress—Miss Esther Kathleen O'Keefe on the Democratic ticket in the Thirteenth Indiana district, and Mrs. Winifred Mason Huck, representative-at-large, Illinois.

Word comes that both nominees are for retention of the prohibition law.

Presbyterian Moderator Maintains That Prohibition Is a Success

Rev. H. C. Swearingen, moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, is of the opinion that national prohibition is as much of a success as can be expected reasonably, considering the short time in which it has been in force. "Prohibition is a measure that seeks to change customs that have been built up through generations," he said, as reported in the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press, "and it would be strange indeed if there were not a great deal of difficulty in enforcing, in the beginning, a law so radically affecting the mode of living of so many persons.

"And this change is being attempted at a time when there is much disregard of criminal laws. The number of hold-ups, bank robberies and automobile thefts show this, but there is no disposition on the part of the people to repeal the statutes bearing on these crimes, because the laws are not observed."

Mr. Swearingen points to the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment by the legislature of New Jersey, a state considered a stronghold of the anti-prohibition forces, as significant of the strength of public opinion behind the measure.

A Candidate After Our Own Heart

The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment is receiving some interesting replies to its communications sent to candidates for Congressional honors. That from a certain Pennsylvania candidate, published in the North American of Philadelphia, disposes of the program of the Association in a satisfactory fashion:

"I have pleasure in replying, promptly and categorically, that your association and myself are on diametrically opposite sides of this question.

"To make answer to your numbered questions in their order:

"One—I heartily declare that I will advocate and work for the maintenance and fullest observance of the Volstead Act.

"Two—I will faithfully labor against any legislation legalizing the sale of light wines and beer.

"Three—I do not favor your policy of leaving the legislation to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment to the several states. The Constitution of the United States is Federal law, and therefore to be enforced by Federal agencies.

"All of the foregoing is but another way of saying that I am in conviction, as by personal practice, wholly 'dry.' If I go to Congress, I pledge my best effort to help stiffen up law enforcement so vigorously that the law-defying, life-destroying and manhood-corrupting practices of bootleggers and their fellow conspirators may substantially increase the population of our prisons."

The Vampire

"Yearly, tens of thousands of alcohol drinkers die. With the rising generation—and whether or not they take to alcohol—rests the future of the trade commercially, politically and economically."

—Brewers' Journal (Great Britain), February 15, 1922.

Beer vs. Beer Sentences

Milwaukee, once renowned for its beer, is now famous for its beer sentences. Twelve men were recently sent to prison for violating the dry laws. It is reported that conspicuous among them was a Kenosha lawyer, who was given five years in Leavenworth and fined $14,500. Several were given two years in the Federal penitentiary and $4,500 fines.

Lowered Tuberculosis Rate Attributed to Prohibition

Dr. James Alexander Miller, president of the National Tuberculosis Association, is said by the Methodist Temperance Committee, to attribute the greatly lowered tuberculosis rate in considerable part to the prohibition movement.

Women at the University of California Repudiate Drinking

Letters signed by ninety-five per cent of the women on the campus of the University of California authorized the Student Affairs Committee to issue a statement to the effect that the women disapproved of drinking parties and obnoxious conduct at the campus dances, and would not remain at functions where these things occurred.

In commenting favorably upon this action, the Fresno (Cal.) Republican says in part:

"The resolve made at the state university by the Student Affairs Committee to come down hard on drinking parties conforms to an imperative demand.

"The other day Controller Sproul of the University of California reported that the budget of the institution now calls for seven million dollars, more than half of which must come from public taxation. The men and women on whom we are spending that much money, even if they now number some 10,000, cannot be permitted to waste their time. They must be effective. They can amuse themselves, just as they can eat and drink, in any way that will promote their bodily and mental efficiency. But they cannot dissipate.

"We are paying high for higher education. And we must have results. Booze cannot be allowed to interfere with it."

Another Brewery Transformed

After almost half a century of continuous operation, the Bosch Brewery company of Lake Linden, Michigan, has closed its doors. It is said the buildings and equipment, changed from time to time to permit the installation of modern machinery, had been in commission forty-eight years. This plant and a smaller one in Houghton, Michigan, owned by the same company, represent an investment of about $400,000. Immediately following the adoption of state prohibition the plant was used for the manufacture of near beer, but the proposition was not a paying one, and it was decided to close down entirely. The building has been rented for storage purposes.

Southern States Prosper Under Prohibition

It is interesting to note that while for years after the Civil War the Southern states were financially prostrated, they have during the past twelve or fifteen years, according to the Blue Book of Progress (issued by the Manufacturers' Record of Baltimore) witnessed a remarkable growth in prosperity. This, in all probability, is due to prohibition. In 1908, the year Georgia, the first Southern state to go dry, closed its saloons, the South spent $65,150,000 on her public schools, increasing that sum in 1920 to $204,225,000; in 1909 the capital of the South invested in manufacturing rose to $2,285,927,698 and ten years later to $6,885,546,000.

Not only have appropriations for schools been tremendously increased, but there has been a marked advance in attendance. The number of graduates from high schools in North Carolina, for example, has within the past four years increased four-fold; the attendance at the University of Kentucky increased from 719 in 1917 to 1,453 in 1921; at North Carolina University, from 500 in 1905 to 1,500 in 1920. All institutions of learning throughout the South show similar increases.

Discarded Brewery to be Used For Manufacture of Maple Products

"The Maple Producers' Co-operative Association has obtained control of one of the largest breweries of Syracuse, N. Y.," says The American Issue, "and will use it for packing and storing maple syrup and maple products. The syrup is to be shipped to Syracuse from Adirondack and the producing sections of New York in steel drums. The new association expects to handle this season about 200,000 gallons of syrup."

From Saloon to Boys' Club

It is reported that Pistol Inn, Chicago, former dance hall and saloon, located in one of the city's toughest districts, has been turned into a boys' club. The place was closed about a year ago by Federal Judge Landis for flagrant violation of the prohibition laws, and was then purchased by the Union League Club for the purpose of providing recreation for the street gamins of the neighborhood, and making of them better American citizens.

SIAM ON THE WATER-MOBILE

Mrs. Fanny Root Danser

"East is East and West is West and never the twain can meet," still it takes the East, it takes the West to make the world complete.

The trend of thought of World Prohibition that started in the West and traveled eastward has now taken root in the little empire of Siam. Siam is the smallest independent monarchy in the world, with a population of about 9,000,000 and an area equal to Spain and Portugal combined. On the north, Siam is separated from China by the mountainous Lao country, the largest city being Chieng Mai, a three day journey from Bangkok. To the northeast and southeast is French territory, while on the west a chain of mountains marks the line which divides Burmah from Siam. To the south of Siam are the Federated Malay States. There is in Siam a mixed population of Siamese, Chinese, Japanese, Indian and Malay, together with British, French and some eighty Americans, mostly missionaries.

Twenty-Three Distilleries in Siam

There are in Siam in nineteen different provinces twenty-three distilleries in which alcoholic drinks are made locally. From the statistical year book for 1920 we find that the amount of liquor made locally in that year was 12,779,628 litres and this retails on the average to the consumer at about seventy-five stangs ($.25) per litre. One litre is about one quart. The people then pay for their local-made liquor about $4,000,000 gold. But besides the local-made liquor 1,838,979 litres were, in the year 1920, imported from fourteen different countries, mostly from Great Britain, France and China. How thankful I am that at the present time America is not exporting into Siam or into any country alcoholic beverages. Would that she were not exporting American-made cigarets for the ruination of this people! The native people are only now beginning to realize that alcohol is a curse to the nation as shown through the number of inmates in her numerous jails and prisons, and through the inefficiency of her people through drink. The native Christians in Bangkok now believe prohibition can come to Siam, and to that end they are working.

Bangkok Observes World's Temperance Sunday

Sunday, January 29, of this year, was a red letter occasion for the advancement of the temperance movement in Siam. On that day, which was our World's Temperance Sunday, temperance sermons were preached in all of the five churches in Bangkok; special services were held in all of the Sunday Schools and temperance talks were given at the various mission chapels. You may ask, "How did this come about?" I am glad to tell you. There is in Bangkok an organization of Siamese Christians, and because they have for some eighteen years been holding annual conferences they call themselves the "Siamese Conference of Christian Workers."

The past year it was my privilege to be chairman of the program committee of the Conference. Besides the one annual conference of three days in October we also held two mid-year conferences. It was arranged by our program committee, which consisted of two Siamese pastors and two Siamese teachers at the Christian college, that at least one hour be given over to temperance at the two-day conference and one whole evening at the annual conference. The request was granted by the Conference executive committee on one condition, that I would secure and prepare the speakers. This I agreed to do. I knew I could depend upon my brother-in-law, Dr. McFarland, to take part for he was always willing, but I wanted some of the Siamese as well.

Native Teacher at College Signs Pledge

I brought the matter before my Bible class of young men at the Bangkok Christian College, and four of them consented to speak, if I would help them. Each was given material for working up a poster and helps for their talks, with the result that the young men, in their zeal and enthusiasm, not only were themselves on fire but they thoroughly aroused their hearers to the necessity of fighting the alcohol evil here in Siam. In the States we have heard for years: "Agitate, educate, organize, legislate." The three years I have been in Siam I have tried every way I could to agitate this great question of the alcohol evil and interest has been created by renewed presentation through the Conferences of Native Christian Workers.

After the October conference it was decided to appoint several working committees to report once a month at the monthly executive meeting. One committee mentioned was the temperance committee of which I was made the chairman. On this committee was also Krue Charoen, the Conference chairman, and two others. Krue Charoen said he wanted to be on the temperance committee for he had now learned, through the conferences, that it was the most important committee there was. He had been a user of cigarets but he has now given them up, signed the temperance pledge and is the strongest temperance worker in Siam. He is teacher at the Christian College so his influence over the young men will mean much for the future of Siam.

College Youths Educated in Temperance

As a means of educating the older young men and the teachers of the college it has been my privilege to hold a temperance class on Saturday evening at the college, meeting once in two weeks. Eighteen members enrolled at the first meeting in November and interest is still at high tide. The little study book, "Alcohol and Health," I have used as a foundation for this course, supplementing my talks with illustrations and experiments from other sources. THE UNION SIGNALS and Young Crusaders which were sent me by the New York state Young People's Branch federation, helped to create interest in World Prohibition, as they were placed where the young people could read them. I wish UNION SIGNAL readers might see the enthusiasm of these college young men and the interest they show.

As always happens, "with knowledge comes interest," and with interest desire to work, so that is just what has come about here, and the result has been the rousing interest on Temperance Sunday, January 29. More talks were prepared for the Christian College than we had time for that one Sunday so we had temperance the next Sunday, too! The Conference Temperance Committee prepared and had printed in Siamese some 5,000 copies of a "temperance questionnaire," "What is Alcohol?", "What do we mean by distillation, fermentation?" etc. It also contained some statistics regarding the amount of liquor made locally as well as imported into Siam. These will be kept in our mission schools as study leaflets. The song, "Touch Not the Cup," was sung in the churches. When one of the young men was told by an older member of the congregation that it was no use working against the liquor traffic, no good could ever come from it, he said, in speaking of it to me, "I translated and put into Siamese a quotation I found in one of the W. C. T. U. leaflets. It was this,—'No good thing is a failure, no evil thing is a success,' and that made me strong." Thank the Lord for young men of such character as this.

Temperance Waves Spread to Outlying Stations

But the temperance wave is not alone for Bangkok. The Conference Temperance Committee is planning to gather together the charts with the talk for each in Siamese, and these we will send to all the outside stations so they can observe some Sunday as a Temperance Sunday. My Bible class of college young men graduate this coming March and I am glad to send them forth with God speed, full of temperance zeal, to various places in Siam—one to Chieng Mai, three to Pitsanaloke, one to Nakon Praton, one to Manila, etc. They will be live fires wherever they go.

But not alone are the young men awake, the young women are, as well In January, at a woman's conference one evening was given over to a temperance program and a most interesting

DEPARTMENT OF CHILD WELFARE

Elizabeth A. Perkins, National Director

When the Eighteenth Amendment was placed in the Constitution of the United States, more was accomplished for Child Welfare than will ever again be possible through any single measure. This is virtually true from racial, economic and human viewpoints. It must be the predominant purpose of all men and women interested in Child Welfare, to assist in nominating and electing to all public offices those who believe in the Eighteenth Amendment, and who do and will uphold the Volstead Act.

¶ What is the best piece of work under way in Webb City, Missouri? Ask the business man, the minister, the club woman, the home woman, and the reply is always the same. "THE W. C. T. U. DAY NURSERY."

¶ During her recent Missouri trip, the national director spent one Sunday in Webb City, and at the close of her talks, men and women alike came to the platform to tell her about the W. C. T. U. day nursery and its splendid work.

¶ Three years ago Mrs. Hortense Stewart gave to the W. C. T. U. the use of the entire first floor of her spacious house, and the large grounds surrounding it, for a day nursery, that the children of working mothers might be properly cared for.

¶ For six weeks after the house was ready not a mother applied. They could not understand why the W. C. T. U. should be doing this work. Then a very young mother brought her little six-weeks-old babe, and soon other mothers brought their children, one, two, three, four.

¶ Mrs. Bonnie Kay, a Christian woman who loves children and who loves the W. C. T. U., is the house mother, and has her home at the nursery. A little lunch is served the children during the forenoon, and a real meal at noon.

¶ Problems? The national director said to the matron, "You have no problems; your great big yard solves your problems." The Chamber of Commerce furnished the teeter-boards—the children have sand piles, play ball, take care of each other.

¶ For rainy or cold days, there are the large, spacious rooms, with toys and dolls and games; and for every day, there is the large room with the tiny beds, so clean and inviting, where every pre-school child takes a little nap, lulled to sleep by the voice of the house mother as she reads a Bible or other story.

¶ Other clubs and groups of men and women contribute financially to the work, but it is under the direction and entire supervision of the W. C. T. U. and heralded far and wide as the W. C. T. U. Day Nursery.

Child Welfare Studies

Conducted by E. A. P.

To Every Child Belongs the Right

- To be well born
- To be educated
- To be protected from child-labor
- To be morally safeguarded
- To be spiritually trained

(Some questions answered by the Iowa Child Research Station)

1. How can I tell whether my child is bright or backward for his age.

Ans. Have a psychological examination of the child. No one is competent to pronounce upon mental development who has not taken university courses in psychology and mental testing. If you want just a rough estimate you can find out what the average child should be able to do at various ages by reading Terman's "The Measurement of Intelligence," published by MacMillan.

2. How can I get my child to go to bed at night without fussing?

Ans. By beginning when the child is very young, to have an early and regular bed-time hour. Stick to that hour, no matter if company or father wants to play with the child. Make going to bed a pleasure, rather than something to be dreaded. DO NOT PROMISE SITTING UP LATE as a reward for good behavior. Read a single children's story, or sing a song when the child is in bed. Omit this pleasure if the child has not co-operated cheerfully in the getting to bed process.

3. What is the proper age of school entrance?

Ans. It depends on the physical development and general maturity of the child. A well grown child of two years will benefit by some regular contact with other children in a directed play group. By the age of four most children are ready for an hour of kindergarten a day provided the program is not too rigid or strenuous. The change from such a kindergarten to school work should be gradual.

4. At what age should a child be taught to read?

Ans. A child can be taught to read in connection with its games and picture books. There is on record a psychological experiment in which such instruction was begun with a little girl of eighteen months. She could read well in a primer by the time she could speak distinctly. A bright strong child should be allowed to read as early as it can. The average child should begin at about five years. There is a modern theory that children should not be taught to read so early as they will find it such a fascinating occupation they will do nothing else. This danger has been exaggerated.

5. At what age should a child dress and undress himself?

Ans. As early as possible. Begin by encouraging the child to pull off his own shoes and stockings. Some children will be able to help themselves a great deal at two years. At five years children should be practically able to dress themselves.

6. How old should a child be before he is allowed to use a hammer, nails, needle?

Ans. Under supervision, at two and one-half, to three years of age.

7. Should there be a nursery or children's room in the home?

Ans. Yes, children should have a room suitably furnished where they may play undisturbed and keep their treasures.

PROHIBITION AS A PROMOTER OF HEALTH

CLEVELAND'S HEALTH COMMISSIONER NOTES 30 PER CENT DECREASE IN DEATHS SINCE PROHIBITION

The commissioner of health for the city of Cleveland, Ohio, believes that under prohibition there has been a definite saving of life. He bases his conclusion on the following facts, given by him to our Cleveland W. C. T. U. representative:

The effect produced on public health by prohibition cannot be adequately judged by vital statistics alone. There are, however, certain forms of sickness which are definitely known to be due in many instances to intemperance, especially as regards alcoholic beverages, and when these diseases result fatally they are given as the cause of death when death certificates are filed according to law.

Delirium tremens, or acute alcoholism, as well as many cases of cirrhosis of the liver and of Bright's disease, have an alcoholic origin. A comparison of deaths occurring in Cleveland due to these causes, before and after prohibition, follows:

Delirium tremens or acute alcoholism	80	42
Cirrhosis of the liver	102	42
Bright's disease	566	565

The increased population of the city in 1921 over 1916 was 116,965, and when all allowance is made for the increase of deaths in proportion to the increase of population, it will be found that with the same rate of death per 1,000 population prevailing in 1921 as in 1916, fifty-one more deaths from acute alcoholism would have occurred, seventy-seven more due to cirrhosis of the liver and ninety-three more from Bright's disease.

This represents a total decrease under prohibition of 221 deaths from these three causes and is 30 per cent less than the number occurring in 1916. Taken collectively, it would seem that under prohibition a definite saving of life has resulted. Furthermore, the total death rate in 1921 in Cleveland is the lowest on record.

DR. ROYAL S. COPELAND, NEW YORK'S HEALTH COMMISSIONER, BELIEVES PROHIBITION HAS BEEN A GREAT FACTOR IN UNITED STATES' "BEST HEALTH YEAR"

Replying to an inquiry from The Union Signal as to what extent in his opinion prohibition had been a factor in giving the United States in 1921 "the best health year" in its history, Dr. Royal S. Copeland, commissioner of health for the city of New York, under date of April 3, 1922, wrote:

"Prohibition has no doubt played a very important and no uncertain part in the health condition. This conclusion is reached as follows: We are informed by the police and court records, in the matter of minor offenses, that there has been a marked amelioration of conditions. Savings banks inform us that the number of depositors has materially increased, and in a report recently made relative to absenteeism in industry, we see a very material improvement, in a big reduction both in labor turnover and in absences. While it would be difficult to scientifically draw an accurate conclusion, these conditions make us feel that in a broad way anything that is generally helpful to groups of people is specifically helpful to public health."

MARKED DECLINE IN ALCOHOLIC CASES ADMITTED TO STATE HOSPITALS OF NEW YORK

"There has been a marked decline in the cases of alcoholic psychosis admitted to our state hospitals during the past few years," writes Dr. Horatio M. Pollock, statistician of the State Hospital Commission of New York, in reply to our inquiry. "I think such decline can be attributed in large measure to legal restrictions on the liquor traffic, but it is probable that the changing habits of the people have also been a factor in the decline..... The number of alcoholic admissions (to our civil state hospitals) in 1921 was lower than in any year prior to 1920..... You undoubtedly have reports of health departments in the various states showing that the death rate during the past year was remarkably low. I think the lessened use of alcohol has been an important factor in reducing the death rate."

CHICAGO BARS TURNED INTO TEA ROOMS

If you dropped in for "a cup of tea" at a certain elegant little tea room in the Railway Exchange building, one of Chicago's finest office edifices, located on Michigan Boulevard, you might imagine, at first glance, that you had stepped back into the days before John Barleycorn was outlawed. The bar, solid mahogany fixtures, mural paintings, deep stalls and everything except perhaps the brass rail are there to remind one of the drinking places of old. Two young Chicago business women, when prohibition threw all liquor establishments into the legal discard, seized upon the opportunity to convert the buffet into a charming cafe. This is patronized daily by between 1300 and 1400 people, not a few of them the former patrons of the bar. The story is told by a visitor to this delightful tea room that with a friend she was seated at one of the tables when a man of sporty appearance took a place opposite them, glanced hastily over the menu, and with a discouraged look, muttered, "There isn't anything here." Imagining that the viands listed on the card were not sufficiently substantial, she sympathetically suggested that he might be able to get more of a man's meal at a certain place near by, naming it. He replied with disgust, "Been there and there isn't anything there either. I'm driving through the country with my car, and stopped at Downer's Grove, and couldn't get a thing, but they told me Chicago was wide open, and plenty to be had. But it isn't true." And with a "weary of the world" air, the thirsty gentleman arose and left the room. And yet the antis persist in insisting that anybody can get anything they wa to drink at any time, without any troubl

DELEGATES FROM ALL QUARTERS OF THE GLOBE TO ATTEND THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION IN PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922

From the Far East and the Near East, from South America and Africa, from Europe and Australia, from Canada and our insular possessions, are coming delegates to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, to be held November 11-16, in Philadelphia. Every mail brings the names of comrades who are to represent foreign lands at this great convocation of white ribboners in the metropolis that for the period of the gathering may well be termed "the city of sisterly love."

India has sent credentials for five delegates: Mrs. D. E. Alter, Mrs. J. Dussman, Miss Helen I. Root, Miss H. Davies, M. D., Mrs. C. B. Hill. In addition Miss Mary Campbell, World's white ribbon organizer, stationed in India, is to attend.

A former national president of the Burma W. C. T. U., Mrs. F. K. Singiser, is to represent that country.

The W. C. T. U. of Egypt has elected as its delegate Mrs. F. S. Hayman, who is returning to the United States on a furlough, with Mrs. S. M. Zwemer as alternate.

A noted author of Finland, Miss Marie Stenroth, will bring the greetings from that brave little prohibition country.

Miss Hardynia K. Norville, World's W. C. T. U. organizer for South America, will be present to tell the story of the wonderful progress in the "Continent of Opportunity," and with her it is expected will come other women prominent in the temperance work.

The corresponding secretary of the Australasian W. C. T. U., Mrs. W. H. Carvosso, has signified her intention of attending.

The Baroness de Laveleye, president of the W. C. T. U. of Belgium, is planning to attend, as is Mrs. James Benedict, wife of the American consul to Newfoundland.

The British Women's Temperance Association, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Canada, and that of Scotland will be well represented at this convention.

Special arrangements will be made for visitors from abroad to take side trips to Washington, D. C., Baltimore and New York, previous to the World's meeting. Immediately following it, they will go to the national convention, to be held at Atlantic City, N. J., within easy journey from Philadelphia. At the close of this gathering many overseas delegates will desire to attend the convention of the World League Against Alcoholism, meeting at Toronto, Ontario, November 24-29.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. RADIOGRAMS

"The Ruban Blanc (White Ribbon) of Brussels, Belgium, now has a magic lantern for use in scientific lectures and entertainments to show the destructive effects of alcohol on the body," writes Mrs. Octave Jacqmain. "The doctors gladly give their time and the use of their slides, which are really fine and very expensive. We shall also soon have a moving picture machine and have sent to the United States for anti-alcohol films."

Sweden is in the midst of a prohibition campaign. The parliament has passed a bill in favor of a consultative referendum on prohibition during the coming August, the men and women to vote separately. Mrs. Lydia B. Johnson of South Dakota, a W. C. T. U. speaker from the United States, writes, "So far I am the only woman to bring the message from the women of America. This campaign must be won by the votes of the women, who far outnumber the men. The possibilities are as great as our faith. The women laugh and weep as I tell them the story of the American women's work for prohibition. You should see the eagerness of those farm women as they reach forth their toil-worn hands to sign the prohibition lists. It means that the mothers of the land are awakening to their duty to protect the race. It is humanity's call to service. It is a part of the Creator's plan to save the world. An anti-prohibition organization was announced through the press on the same day I reached Stockholm. Through it the election or referendum will be rushed on before the dry forces had expected it. But personally I do not see any danger in this. As I have traveled through the country, many of the dry veterans have said to me: 'The referendum will not come in my time, but may come sometime.' The hope of the final settling of the liquor question this year will electrify them into activity. It will awaken new forces for the campaign."

At the recent national convention of the India W. C. T. U. the representatives of the organization and the Christian Literature Society consummated plans for the union of the temperance magazines formerly published under the auspices of the two societies, namely, The India Temperance Record and White Ribbon, and The Indian Temperance News. The new magazine, to be published monthly, is to be called The Indian Temperance News and White Ribbon. Its editor is Mrs. W. L. Ferguson. A section will be devoted to the men's point of view.

Senora Bernardina Munoz de De Maria, President Liga Contra El Alcoholismo of Uruguay

Under the able leadership of Senora Bernardina Munoz de De Maria, the Liga contra el Alcoholismo of Uruguay is doing a remarkable work. Senora de De Maria who is well known throughout the republic, and is greatly beloved, is finely educated, and gives to the Liga much prestige. She has enlisted the interest and co-operation of some of the most distinguished men and women of Uruguay, and President Brum and other government officials have been most cordial in their expressions of appreciation of the work of the Liga in the schools, among the mothers, and the young people.

Through an oversight, the name of Mrs. Carrie Van Domselaar of Montevideo, Uruguay, was given in a recent article, as the president of the Liga contra el Alcoholismo. Mrs. Van Domselaar has been from the first the devoted friend of the work and the leader among the English speaking temperance workers.

Two weeks following the death of Miss Josefa Abiertas, the gifted young president of the W. C. T. U. of Manila, the Philippines, a memorial fund of 1,400 pesos ($700) was raised at a memorial mass meeting, to be used in sending some one to the United States to study and prepare to become an organizer and national leader of the work in the Philippines. The young woman selected is Miss Consuelo Valdez, twenty-two years of age, an honor student of the University and an excellent platform speaker. It is thought two years post-graduate work in the United States will be sufficient to prepare her for leadership.

Azuma Moriya, leader of the children's work in Japan, writes of the critical illness of Madam Yajima, immediately after her return from her Peace pilgrimage to America. "When the doctors said they did not feel sure of Madam Yajima's recovery," writes Miss Moriya, "the national W. C. T. U. executive committee was immediately called and it was agreed that a great prayer meeting should be held in memory of Madam Yajima's trip to America. Many of the local presidents throughout the empire came to Tokyo to attend the meeting, and all the unions in Japan held prayer meetings on the same day. It was a wonderful meeting. Prayer was offered not only for Madam Yajima's recovery but for world-wide peace." The latest word from Japan indicates an improvement in Madam Yajima's health.

News has been received of the passing to the other world of Pundita Ramabai, the world-famous friend of the child widows of India. Literally thousands of girls have passed through her schools and are now in homes of their own or in active service for humanity. In the beginnings of her enterprise Pundita Ramabai had many friends and co-workers in the United States. Among the most enthusiastic was Frances E. Willard, who entertained the Pundita at Rest Cottage. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union took a keen interest in her efforts to educate and save the child widows and was instrumental in forming many Ramabai circles.

Help Fulfill This Prophecy!

"There's going to be a pretty stiff fight made on national prohibition in the next few months," a man was heard to remark the other day, "but I'll wager that it wins out, for the women will stand by it."

History to date seems to justify his prophetic words—the women are standing by it. Did you read the strong resolution passed the other day at the national convention of the Young Women's Christian Association? Have you seen the neat little leaflet circulated by the Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, giving among the "Prominent Welfare Issues" for which it stands, "Prohibition—no change in the Volstead Act which would readmit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement."

Of course the women will stand by the prohibition law, if they are made to realize there is need for them to help. It is the special business of the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to bring to the attention of every woman in every community the attack that is being made upon our "home protection" law.

The three weeks' intensive membership campaign closed May 14, but local unions will not cease their efforts to secure new members. The work will continue without abating one jot or one tittle in enthusiasm until the co-operation of every woman voter is secured in the campaign to hold and to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment.

Don't Fail to Vote at the Primaries

It is the first duty of every citizen to vote at the primaries. Why? Because the primaries are for the express purpose of letting the people indicate directly how they shall be governed and by whom they shall be governed. Now is the time to scrutinize the records and reputation of candidates. Next November will be too late. The time to find fault and to sift the competent politician from the incompetent, the honorable from the self-seeking, the good from the bad is now—AT THE PRIMARIES.

The Falsehood About Iceland

Certain papers are carrying a news item concerning prohibition in Iceland, which reads: "At least one country in this wide world has tried prohibition and found it a failure." To this is added the substance of a dispatch claimed to have been received from Iceland that the parliament of that country has repealed its prohibitory law and adopted a measure permitting the sale and consumption of wines. The item is not only misleading but deliberately false. It may be that Iceland's parliament has taken the action stated, although authentic news to that effect has not yet been received, but if it has so done, it was not because prohibition was considered a failure, nor because the people of the little island demanded it, but because Spain refused to continue commercial relations with the country unless it did. Spain not long ago delivered an ultimatum to Iceland declaring it would not renew its trade treaty governing the importation of Iceland's dried fish unless that country would repeal its prohibition law and buy Spanish wines. That Iceland was far from willing to accede to this unjust demand is evidenced by the appeal the people of the island sent to the United States and to England to give them moral support in refusing to consent to the demand.

This unwarranted and unprincipled attack of a big country on a little government that had the moral courage and good sense to protect its people by a prohibitory law, is part of a scheme, to which the liquor interests of all countries are no doubt parties, to check the movement to abolish the liquor traffic. It is deemed not improbable that similar attacks will be made upon Finland, and upon Norway, which has a measure of prohibition. Reports are being received telling of an effort to secure the repeal of Scotland's Temperance Act, that permits a no-license vote in local units.

All of which serves to show how vitally important to the whole world, and especially to the little nations who have been pioneers for prohibition, it is that the United States should demonstrate at the next election its whole-hearted support of the prohibition principle, and the determination of its voting citizens to insist upon the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act.

Every ballot cast at the coming primaries and at the November election for candidates for Congress pledged to stand by national prohibition will be a ballot cast for the advancement of the prohibition movement in Europe, Asia, Africa, South America and the islands of the sea.

Tremble, King Alcohol!

"There has been a regrettable slump in visible and audible patriotism since the close of the war," says Mr. F. G. Blair, Illinois' superintendent of public instruction, in an article on the advisability of bringing the Liberty Bell to the middle western states during the coming summer. "Evidence is not wanting that there are ugly and unpatriotic influences at work. The industrial and employment situation is disturbing and irritating some of our working people. At heart all of them are soundly and truly American, but we need some new and lofty call to revive within us some of the nobler patriotic impulses."

Without question there are not so many signs of patriotism as during the war, and most of us need a driving impulse to keep at white heat the real patriotism within our hearts. We are quite too apt to drift with the tide when nothing occurs to mar the serenity of our ways.

But (though they are not conscious of it) the wet forces in their campaign against prohibition, are furnishing exactly the dynamic needed to bring every champion of righteousness into line to wage this modern fight for liberty—the liberty of the womanhood and childhood of this land and of the world to develop as God meant, free from the thralldom of King Alcohol.

In other days the temperance folks demonstrated that one could chase a thousand and two put ten thousand to flight, when working in a good cause. In the present time, the thought that the enemy is working to nullify prohibition the policy for which they and those who preceded them fought a good fight, is like the cry of Paul Revere, and once more we spring to arms. "Tremble, King Alcohol," whether in the guise of whisky, beer, light wines, or any other liquor, for our country calls upon us to defend it law, and we shall win!

PIONEER WORKER IN WORLD'S AND NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PROMOTED

Mrs. J. K. Barney

In the translation to life eternal of Mrs. Josiah Kent Barney, prominent nationally and internationally as a leader in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the galaxy of white ribboners in the celestial world has received a notable accession. As World's W. C. T. U. organizer, as president of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U., and as a national superintendent, Mrs. Barney has helped in a large way to "make history" and promote the interests of the prohibition cause in this and other lands.

This beloved comrade was of New England parentage. She was born in Pawtucket, then a part of Massachusetts, on November 24, 1834. In her young womanhood she married Josiah Kent Barney, and during the first years of their married life the young couple resided in Nevada, where Mr. Barney was engaged in silver mining. It was here she first became engaged in W. C. T. U. activities.

Upon her return to the East she threw herself whole-heartedly into the temperance work, specializing on prison reform service, in which she was a pioneer. She later became superintendent of Prison Reform work for the World's and National W. C. T. U. From 1877 to 1884 she served as president of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U.

As World's W. C. T. U. missionary, she made a trip around the world, spending much time in Australia, speaking and organizing, and also organized the first W. C. T. U. in Jerusalem. She made four trips to Europe in the interests of the work, attending several World's W. C. T. U. conventions, and stimulating and encouraging comrades in every country she visited. A charming, forceful speaker, possessed of a winsome personality that made friends for her everywhere, gifted with a keen intellect, and practical common sense, combined with a beautiful spiritual nature, Mrs. Barney influenced hundreds of women, young and old, to enlist in the W. C. T. U. army and consecrate their lives to the holy war for God and Home and Everyland.

In her own state Mrs. Barney was greatly beloved. She was the honorary president of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U. and was the oldest living member of the Rhode Island Woman's Club. Her husband, Josiah Kent Barney, survives her. She leaves a son, Charles A. Barney, five grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren.

The committal service was held at the Trinity M. E. Church, Providence, R. I., on the afternoon of May 1. A large company of white ribboners from different parts of the state, with many other friends, came to pay their last earthly tribute to one they dearly loved and revered.

The many beautiful floral tributes from the World's and National W. C. T. U., and from church and home friends evidenced the esteem in which she was held and many were the tributes paid to her memory. A beautiful one was tendered her by her personal friend and co-laborer, Mrs. Mary A. Babcock, who is one of the honorary presidents of the state union, as was Mrs. Barney.

Dr. George B. Thomas, pastor of the church of which she was a long-time member, spoke in a most feeling manner of her consecrated, noble life. A telegram from the general officers of the National W. C. T. U. was read by him.

As the long line of white ribbon comrades passed the casket, each one placed therein a white flower, emblematic of the life of their co-worker. Later, two hundred of them acted as a guard of honor, in a double line reaching to the street.

Many followed the family to the Riverside Cemetery, where, in a beautiful spot, overlooking the water, with all nature about opening up into new life, the beloved body was reverently placed.

A most touching scene which will linger in the memory of those present, was the recitation of a favorite farewell poem by her husband, Mr. Josiah Kent Barney, who is ninety-one years old. His glorified face as he spoke these words of parting to the loved companion, revealed a Christian faith and character which matched her own.

Of Mrs. Barney it could truly be said, "The world is my parish, to do good my religion." Providence claimed her as one of its gifted daughters; Rhode Island rejoiced in her as its president emeritus; as a member of the national executive committee, she wielded a nation-wide influence, and the white ribboners of the world, who remember her wise counsel and inspiring messages, think with gratitude of her service as a World's W. C. T. U. missionary. Today she is with Frances Willard and Lillian Stevens, renewing the associations of other years, and rejoicing with them over triumphs achieved and victories yet to be recorded.

Wet Forces Must Reckon Now With Woman's Vote

The wet interests, in their former contests, did not have the women to contend with. All the women could do was to pray for the ousting of the saloon. Whilst their prayers availed much, their votes will be even more effective, which fact will certainly dawn upon the minds of the beer guzzlers and wine bibbers when the ballots shall have been counted next November. The great mass of the womanhood of the nation were against the saloon when it thrived in the midst of the people; the great mass of the womanhood of the state of Ohio will exercise their new-born privilege at the polls next fall in such a manner as shall put several more nails in the coffin of John Barleycorn.—St. Mary's (Ohio) Leader.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Task Imposed

J. J. Skordalsvold

Let others crave for something yonder,
Some land they think more fair and free;
O'er such thing vacant brains may ponder,
America is good enough for me.

Our mother earth has never nourished
A better place in her embrace;
What we enjoy is fondly cherished
In every time, by every race.

The sun, arrayed in his vast splendor,
Triumphant on his westward course,
His services did never tender
To such a commonwealth as ours.

This, fellow citizens, imposes
A duty which we must perform,
Through shower and shine, through thorns and roses,
To seek for life, a nobler norm.

For one thing, here must rise that passion
For peace so high, so deep, so strong
That war foe aye gets out of fashion,
Then all the world will come along.

Still much is crooked, warped among us;
Now let it be your task and mine
To down the tyrannies that throng us,
To make our efforts more divine.

Stickers

If the efforts of reformers are to be successful, their work must not be done spasmodically in the enthusiasm of the moment. The destructive forces are working twenty-four hours per day, three hundred and sixty-five days per annum. The reformers must become "stickers" to their job. The committee for the World's W. C. T. U. convention have discovered a method by which every temperance worker may become a twenty-four hour worker for the cause. Just enclose $3.00 for a thousand or 50 cents for a hundred and say "Stickers," to

Exhibits and Fairs

Carolyn P. Lindsay, National Superintendent

Have you noticed, dear reader, that the name of this department has been transposed? "There's a reason." It's to let you know that the exhibit is the first and finest thing with which to create sentiment for law enforcement, for Americanization, for Christian Citizenship, for Child Welfare, for Moral Education, for World Prohibition, for Women in Industry, for Scientific Temperance Instruction, and all the other splendid specific lines of reform followed by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It will also emphasize the many benefits of prohibition.

The work of assembling an exhibit is quite fascinating. Art and originality may evolve a beautiful, convincing argument that will please as well. Present authoritative truths (that defy challenge) in colorful, symmetrical, legible posters. Use photographs; enlarge them, tint them, mount them, frame them, string them together to form panels; they tell the truth so wonderfully. Get those "before and after" saloon pictures, to demonstrate the 'benefits' of prohibition.

Emphasize World Prohibition by the use of a huge globe and mark conspicuously thereon the countries where the W. C. T. U. is at work. With it use flags of the countries marked. Dolls are lovely for Child-Welfare and Americanization exhibits. Some magazine pictures are large enough to be effective in conjunction with a well lettered "slogan." A clothes line full of miniature clothing, toys, furniture, etc., is most taking in a Child-Welfare exhibit.

Diagrams, charts, ribbons, pictures, models, all are employed most effectively in the making of an exhibit. Do not try to get one together in a great hurry. Good results are best attained by the process of evolution through much thought, time, patience, and money; but, the complete product has no equal as an educator and convincer. Plan an exhibit to be proud of, and you will enjoy your reward in proportion to the effort put forth.

Fair time is here again. Do you know of any fairs to be held and have you planned for a day nursery, an exhibit, a medal contest, a spelling bee, a hospital, a mothers' congress, a lunch counter, a baby parade, a "movie," a float, a community sing, a playlet, or a speaker? Have you ordered the special literature for distribution to the sometimes disinterested, uneducated public who get only wet propaganda through the newspapers? A national catalogue will advise you of the many leaflets and supplies to be had.

Opportunities other than fairs may be yours in which to present W. C. T. U. principles, for there never was a time when our organization had so many doors open to it as now. Do not let an influence be lost. See to it that your fair is an educative, pleasurable, wholesome institution not menaced by the presence of a carnival and its attending evils. Let your fair officers hear from you. If the fair is good in every way, tell them so; if it has objectionable features, see that a flood of protests are sent. Write at once to your fair officers and learn through them the date of your fair, then "get busy," very busy. Secure your space and your privileges early, and have frequent meetings of your fair committee.

But, under no consideration, forget that this is an "all-the-year-round" department and the opportunities for service are countless. Which reminds me, that you may have plans for a fountain or some other memorial. There are many ways in which to visualize W. C. T. U. principles.

Need for Sabbath Observance from Religious and Economic Viewpoints

Emma L. Starrett, National Superintendent

It is the belief of the national superintendent of the department of Sabbath Observance that the "blue law" propaganda sent out in telegrams by the thousands for publication in the press all over the country, has proved a boomerang. More than ninety per cent of these messages, according to estimate, originated in New York and Washington. They were so similar in sentiment and evident purpose as to suggest a common origin. Editorials in a large number of the secular papers, also letters, and addresses by leading citizens, have tended to counteract the influence of these telegrams. Though they were given publicity far and wide they did not express the prevailing views and sentiments of the regions where they were published.

Renewed activity and interest on the part of all good citizens and the churches, for the enforcement of our Sunday laws, have been created. The defense of the Sabbath is taking new and strong forms. Thinking people recognize the fact that this smoke screen was used for the purpose of creating sentiment against the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and also to hide the real object of these interests which know and want no law but one, "Put money in thy purse"—a commercialized Sunday.

Civil Law

"The commandment which establishes the Holy Day, and guards it as a day of rest, is not arbitrary. The laws of our physical being require one day in seven for relaxation. At least, so men of science—from Proudhon and Haegler to Gies and Martin, who have given special study to the matter—have demonstrated. Civil law, then, is needed to protect the right of every individual to a weekly rest day, with its exemption from ordinary labor and the distractions of week day affairs, with guarantees of religious privileges.

"While cherishing our deep convictions concerning the religious significance of the Sabbath day, we would add that an invincible plea for one day in seven as a rest day for all classes of people can be made without any reference to the religious significance of such a day. The whole history of civilization proves that such a day is vital to the physical, economic, social, political and moral welfare of the people. In such fact is found the justification of legislation by the state touching the day. Not to make men religious by law but to safeguard the right and liberty of all. Without such legislation selfish greed would drive helpless labor to ceaseless toil, not only in ordinary commercial, manufacturing, mechanical and traffic business, but also to provide amusement and entertainment for the idle multitudes. Men of all religious faiths, and o none, are, therefore, alike interested in this fundamental question. The spirit o law is the spirit of civilization. He wh is unwilling to have his personal liberty limited by the rights and interests o others is both an unworthy and a danger ous citizen."

Documents dating from the first an third century, all speak plainly of the ol servance of Sunday in early Christia times. Tertullian, of the second centur writes: "Sunday we give to joy. W as we have received, ought on the da of the Lord's resurrection to forbea worldly duties and defer even our bus ness." In the fourth century, becaus of laxity and indifference, Constantin decreed that Sunday should be observe as a day of rest: "Let the magistrat and people residing in cities rest, ar let all workshops be closed."

So the evidence of the need of suc laws has been accepted by the lawmake of all the Christian centuries. Our n tional Constitution recognizes it. T legislatures of nearly all the states our Union protect it. The Supreme Cou and many state courts have upheld t validity of Sunday laws as the comm law of the land and important fro both a religious and economic view-poi

But these laws would be valuele without strong and persistent enfor ment. Shall not all Christian peop recognizing the Sabbath as an insti tion divine, realize that the law th protects it is human and must be forced by human means?

So let us renew our efforts in th

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

LARGE AUDIENCE OF CHINESE STUDENTS AND OFFICIALS LISTEN TO TEMPERANCE MESSAGE—BANDS OF MUSIC GREET SPEAKER—MANY SIGN THE PLEDGE

Frances Willard Wang

The Chinese New Year has just passed and I am again busying myself with our student members and those who have not yet joined us. You will be interested to know what a successful time I had in north China, in spite of a brief illness in the latter part of last fall.

I started for Peking in the beginning of September to join Miss Christine Ting-ing in Shansi province where she had gone with some missionary friend after her vacation in Rei Ta Ho. When I arrived in Peking, I went to Ping Ting Hsien of Shansi with Dr. and Mrs. Crumpacker of the Church of Brethren Mission. This was the first place I started a temperance campaign in the fall. Through their kind introduction I got in touch not only with the student class, but also the officials, business men and soldiers in their town. Meetings were held twice a day in the church belonging to the mission. People were very eager to hear what I had to say to them. Every time there were so many of them that additional seats had to be put in. The reason was because I was the pioneer lady speaker to their city. At the end of each meeting, the chairman would ask, 'How many of you think what Miss Wang said is right and want to join her to fight the unseen foes?" At this, hundreds of hands would raise up. Sometimes they were very tiny and touching and sometimes the big and strong hands of Army officers. But very seldom we see the hands of officials for it seems to them they can't work unless they have a cup or two of alcoholic drinks at their meals. Although hundreds of pledges were passed and collected, they were not signed by any of them. I was discouraged, of course. Then I thought, one day, I had better change my policy. So I went to pay them friendly calls at their residences. I called on them once or twice and they received me very courteously. But still nothing was happening. A great surprise, however, came the day before I left for Tai Yuan. As I was packing, a servant knocked at my door. When it was opened, he handed me a letter with a few money bills in it. Behold it was from the very officials and their wives to whom I paid a few visits, telling me that they wanted to become our members and the money was for their membership dues!

From Ping Ting Hsien I went to Tai Yuan. Yong Chuan was the place where I had to take a train for the capital. It is not a very big place, but a modern city, active in the coal traffic. A meeting was planned for me beforehand. When I arrived there, I found my audience waiting in a big Confucius temple yard, for no place in the whole town was enough for the crowd. As I was entering the temple gate, bands from different schools played to welcome me. I really felt wabbling from left to right, although the crowd didn't notice it. The occasion was so solemn that it seemed someone were to be inaugurated for a great general. But at last I got on the platform, which is really a stage, for in Chinese temples there is always a stage for seasonal plays, and felt once more like myself. The stage was facing the sun and the meeting was in the middle of the day. The burning heat on my face and body was unbearable, but I was glad the audience didn't suffer the same intense heat as I did.

After the meeting I went to take my train. The bands and others in my audience followed me courteously to the station. After bidding them goodbye, by a bow, I took a seat in the second class cabin. It was a very interesting but strenuous day. I was glad the cool breeze rested me before I got to Tai Yuan, where I was met by a group of friends and was taken to Mr. Arnold's home.

Shansi is often called the model province by the people who live there. It sounded quite, or rather, too egotistic to some of us, but when we had seen the work of the government, we admitted the truth. By no means is it perfect, but the good governor Yen is trying his best to improve the province. Good roads are being built in many parts, prisoners are being kept clean and industrious, soldiers are requested to study and learn manual work, etc. The thing that attracted the visitors most of all was the two self-examination halls. During different occasions, speakers are introduced to address the citizens in the city. Never before had they heard a lady speaker, until I came. For a whole week I spoke to students, soldiers and other classes and reached about 11,516 people. As a result of the campaign, a little less than a hundred became our members by signing up the pledge cards.

From Tai Yuan I went to Tai Ku. Here Miss Tinling and I met for the first time since summer. The altitude of this place is about 3,000 feet above the sea level and I was very much affected by the elevation. After a few meetings held in the jails and schools, I got ill—unable to sleep. At the suggestion of the physician, Dr. Henningway, I went down to Peking where the altitude is much lower. Sure enough I was better and once more I began to work. But after a few days the old illness came back. At the order of Dr. Peabody of the Union Medical College, I went up to the western hills with some dear friends, about ten days. The rest did improve my health wonderfully. Then I began to realize my trouble was caused not only by the elevation of the land but it was also due to the strenuous life I had been carrying.

About Christmas I felt quite strong so I returned to Shanghai to attend our national convention—the very first ever held in China by women without the help of foreign friends. We had delegates from all parts of China and the whole thing was a great success.

During the fall of 1921 I spoke forty-five times, reached 16,018 people and secured 464 signed up pledges.

Now the spring has come, I intend to stay more of the time in the headquarters. I feel I am needed here to keep in touch with our student members.

This year we are to publish a temperance paper. There is to be a students' section, which includes the Y. P. B. and the L. T. L. This, we think, is going to help us a great deal.

The work is about to bloom in China. Remember, dear friends, to pray for us so that we may have supreme guidance from above.

Massachusetts Y. P. B. Holds High Powered Convention

Special Correspondence

At the third annual convention of the Massachusetts Y. P. B. held in the Second Congregational church of Palmer, delegates from six Branches were present to enjoy the imposing program. Every arrangement for enjoyment and comfort had been made.

President Ethel Frances Love called the meeting to order. At the close of the devotional exercises, Miss Marion Beckwith of the Palmer Y. P. B. voiced words of welcome, to which the state vice-president, Forest A. Black, responded.

The president appointed Dr. N. Louise Rand of the North End Y. P. B. chairman of the nominating committee, and Richard Morton, chairman of the resolutions committee.

Mrs. Florence Reid presented the report of the corresponding secretary, Frank DeLuca that of the recording secretary and William Talbot, the treasurer's. Departmental superintendents gave two minute sketches of their year's work.

The third annual address of Miss Ethel Love, president, deserves highest praise. In earnest, enthusiastic words, she set forth the events of the past year, and then declared her confidence in what the future has in store. Her tributes to the W. C. T. U., Miss Anna A. Gordon, Frances E. Willard, Neal Dow, and Mrs. Ada Frisbee were especially noteworthy. In short, the address was one that surveyed comprehensively, and with insight, the entire field of W. C. T. U. and Y. P. B. endeavors.

A most compelling attraction was a talk by Harold D. Wilson, former prohibition enforcement chief in Massachusetts. In straightforward, clean-cut terms, he told of the trials and tribulations connected with his duties, and many anecdotes concerning the underhanded work of liquor politicians. He "Is Drink Killing England?" by Elizabeth Banks in the April Forum.

The writer is a well known American journalist who has been living in England studying the economic conditions there. She declares that "with all the lamentations over Britain's unhappy industrial situation, with all the talk about unemployment, I find very few public speakers or writers for the press who will come out boldly and tell the truth about the present situation, and put the blame for it where it belongs—upon the breweries and the public houses.

"Large numbers of the working people, if bidden to choose between food and beer, choose beer—and since it helps them, in a way, to forget their sordid, colorless lives, a good many of the members of the so-called 'upper classes' encourage them to drink. I have even heard some employers in large factories say they prefer moderate drinkers to total abstainers as working people, since the first thing a man does when he becomes an abstainer is also to become dissatisfied!

"Meantime, little children, hundreds of thousands of tiny future British citizens, stand outside the public houses, often for hours, sometimes asleep while yet they stand waiting for fathers and mothers to get their fill of beer and then to come out and take them home; little boys and little girls look longingly into the public house counting the years till they will be past fourteen, when they, too, will be welcomed within and be able to buy poison on their own account."

"Prohibition Progress in India" in the Missionary Review of the World for May.

"Students in India are joining with other national groups in passage of resolutions condemning liquor shops and the use of intoxicating liquor. This is one phase of the Ghandi movement, which maintains that beverage alcohol is sapping the vitality of body, mind and soul of the Indian nation. One unique fact is the system of pickets under which volunteers stand near liquor shops and ask the ingoing customer not to drink. If the customer persists, the picket falls on his knees and begs him not to drink. Some pickets carry bottles of milk and offer the thirsty man free milk to drink. In some places, the drinker is boycotted. The movement is very successful in cutting down drinking and in closing saloons. Several of the independent states of India have adopted prohibition in varying forms."

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

"Good Health and Morals" One Slogan of Montana Workers

Special Correspondence

Our Montana organization has combined the departments of Health and Social Morality, with Berenice Morse Andrew in charge of the work. This is a financial saving for the state and seems to make it easier for the local unions. Where there is a scarcity of workers, one superintendent can handle the two departments.

This year our efforts have been made effective by the use of the health posters put out by the American Social Hygiene Association. These happily combine the health and social hygiene teachings. We purchased the set, "Youth and Life." The set, "Keeping Fit," was loaned to us by our state board of health. In showing these posters, we have met with hearty co-operation from pastors, teachers and nurses. In only one locality did the teacher object to the posters being used. Later, they admitted Miss Lida Herrick, a national worker, who gave the same instruction in a different way.

The department owns certain books on the subject which are loaned to readers over the state.

We are trying to create a proper respect for the body and to teach its care, realizing that there is a vital relation between good health and good morals.

campaign of education, feeling our personal responsibility for the enforcement of God's law, upheld by the laws of our land as fundamental to the perpetuity of a Christian civilization.

Our department Plan of Work has been sent to state superintendents in sufficient quantity to supply at least one to every local union in the state. More will be sent on request. Report blanks (25 cents per 100) are ready for distribution. A budget of leaflets will be furnished gratis, with the hope that at least one order will be sent to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois. The two latest leaflets are entitled "Sabbath Observance a Fundamental Principle," "Gem Thoughts of Great Men Concerning the Sabbath." May we not hope that all who realize the importance of the campaign we are waging will order and distribute literature and in every way help us to obey our Lord's command to "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Meeting was held. A teacher is translating "The Life of Frances Willard," and some of Miss Tinling's stories. Our W. C. T. U., organized last August, is working along Scientific Temperance Instruction lines. At a joint meeting held last week of the Conference temperance committee and of the three members of the S. T. I. committee it was decided to observe a temperance day in all the Christian schools on June 9. At this time all teachers are to be asked to hand in temperance essays relating to some phase of the alcohol question. They are to act as a nucleus for temperance teaching in the schools.

Citizenship Class a Membership Getter

The Westerville (Ohio) W. C. T. U. has a live superintendent of Christian Citizenship in Mrs. Ernest Cherrington, who, shortly after she accepted the office, set about devising methods for promoting the work of her department. As an initial step she proceeded, with the assistance of a strong committee of seven representative women, to organize a class for the study of the duties of citizenship. The local union voted to devote the greater part of the time of the regular meeting to a Civil Government class, open to all in the community. Seventy-five earnest and enthusiastic women attended the first meeting, which had been widely advertised through the local press, church bulletins, pulpit notices, literary clubs, church societies, the Eastern Star, and many other mediums. A fine program was given, followed by a quiz on the lesson. The topic for the day had been the Constitution of the United States and a copy of it was presented to each woman as she came forward to sign the class roll.

The success which attended the class work encouraged the union to go a step further and arrange for a series of public meetings to be held in the different churches under the auspices of the department of Christian Citizenship. A prominent public speaker is to be brought to Westerville about once a month to lecture on subjects pertaining to government, the meeting to be turned later into a public forum for questions and discussion. The first public gathering, held in the Methodist church, drew a large crowd in spite of the fact that there were four other meetings in progress that same evening. The ministers of the churches, the local press, the college, the brotherhoods of the churches, the president of the city council, the president of the Chamber of Commerce, and the Scout masters of the Boy Scout troops all seemed eager to co-operate. The Boy Scouts, in addition to distributing hand-bills over the town the day of the meeting, as their contribution to its success, were well represented in the audience.

Monroe County (N. Y.) Instructs and Enthuses

Special Correspondence

The eighteenth annual institute of the Monroe county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U., held recently at Spencerport, was an interesting and enthusiastic occasion. Mrs. J. H. Roberts, county president, assisted by the other officers, kept everything moving in an orderly manner. Mrs. D. Leigh Colvin, state vice-president, and Mrs. H. H. Jerome, president of Livingston county W. C. T. U., were welcome and helpful guests.

Among the features of the program were "echoes" from the regional conference, a drill in citizenship, and a playlet on Temperance and Missions which proved both entertaining and instructive. A practical demonstration by superintendents of departments, while causing merriment, carried a lesson. Not everyone could win in the contest of three-minute speeches on "Law Enforcement and the Work of the W. C. T. U.," but it was safe to say that much thought and effort were put forth by all who participated. Up-to-date temperance facts gave information and "Our Foreign Neighbors" showed that there is still work to be done. The Y. P. B. secretary told how to win the young people. After a two days' feast of innumerable good things, the meeting closed with a gold medal contest.

A W. C. T. U. "Booze" Party!

Nebraska's state sheriff, Mr. Gus Hyers, recently gave a party at which there was much liquid refreshment, but instead of trickling down the throats of his guests, it was poured into Salt Creek, at a point near the city of Havelock. Mr. Hyers had invited leading W. C. T. U. women to witness the destruction of more than 300 gallons of intoxicating liquor, valued at about $10,000, "evidence" which had been ordered destroyed by various courts. Armed with hatchets and axes, the enforcement officers and the W. C. T. U. representatives smashed the bottles and jugs which were laid out on the bank of the creek. A number of these empty receptacles were taken home by the women as souvenirs of the occasion.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, he is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Pitying her, he tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. At a small dinner she meets Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb. Strengthened by his presence and that of her mother and step-father, she declines wine and denounces the social glass. During a camping trip she sees her cook overcome by liquor, and her fears for herself are redoubled.)

CHAPTER XV.

Angela and her mother and step-father left camp at the end of the month. They went back to Seraneb for a few days' preparations required by Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer for their journey through India, and back to America, where they were due at the end of March.

It was a sad parting; the mother yearned over her only child, knowing the inheritance which must prove a source of daily temptation. The girl clung to her mother as to a refuge from harm—without her, she felt like a reed shaken by the wind! Every hour which brought the parting nearer, was counted with a burst of sorrow. Such was her distress that Mrs. Mortimer longed for the intervening time to be over.

Mr. Mortimer, with great tact, arranged with Dr. Scott to come over, and go with them to the railway station, then to come back with Angela to dinner.

As the carriage waited for them at the door, Harford rode up to call.

"Mother, here is Mr. Harford,—my kind friend of the voyage."

Mrs. Mortimer thanked him warmly, but said nothing as to his future help to her child.

"Come again to-morrow morning; I shall be alone," Angela said, as he took leave at once.

He smiled and bowed. "At one o'clock then!"

Very promptly the following day, Harford kept his promise. Angela's eyes were swollen, and she looked woebegone but she made a brave endeavor to be cheerful.

"I want a long talk with you," she said. "You do not know that I failed to keep my promise made before we left the 'Persia'!"

"Have you? I'm sorry!"

"Yes! My husband objected—he will not hear of my being an abstainer, and he utterly negatived my request that wine should not appear on our table."

"Ah! it is a difficult path for you, I see."

"It is, indeed! My mother found me taking wine regularly, and liking it, yes! loving it!—fascinated by it! And she told me a story of my father, which she had hidden from me all these years, fearing to pain me." She paused and shuddered.

"What was it?"

"My father was an inebriate; he tried to kill my mother—and—and——"

She broke down and sobbed.

Harford was sorely distressed. "Oh, do cheer up, Mrs. Fortescue! You are not so badly off as I am; you know I had two drinking parents!"

Angela recovered herself with difficulty.

"But, you see, I am not like you! I am the weakest of creatures."

"Come now, don't say so; rather believe that you can be strong if you choose." He wanted by suggestion to inspire her with belief in herself.

"Yes, you are right: I ought to try, at any rate, to resist temptation, but you see how surrounded I am. It is not now and then I am subjected to it, but always, and everywhere! In my own home, twice every day; in every house I visit—at every function I attend I meet my enemy!"

"Still you must believe in your own powers to resist. You made a brave fight at the Padre's table; I thought you splendid!"

"I don't think I could have done it, if you and Mother and Mr. Mortimer had not been present. There it is! I'm like that tiny little Virginia creeper that grows up the trees and runs along walls, always must have something to rest upon. Now you are like the great palm. You can stand alone!"

He smiled, and passing by the simile said, "But you not only spoke there for yourself, but for all tempted ones! That was noble!"

She smiled radiantly at his commendation.

"And," he went on, "I believe you made an impression on the Padre. He is a thoughtful man, and if once convinced that a course is unwise will give it up. At least, that is how I read his character!"

At that moment cards were brought in.

"The man himself! Talk of an angel and you hear his wings," she said, as she greeted him. "Mr. Selwyn, we were talking about you."

"Indeed! I hope your comments were favorable!"

"We said we were sure you were strong to do the right!"

"Ah! that is very complimentary, but in what connection, may I ask?"

Angela colored; Harford came to the rescue.

"In the matter of not offering alcoholic drinks to visitors."

MRS. L. F. PEASE, 258-260 Laurel St. Dept. U, Buffalo, N. Y.

Mr. Selwyn started and stammered. I—I—never saw the thing in so clear a ght. It would be very terrible, as you ay, to push anyone over the precipice, Irs. Fortescue, but such cases are very are. And what can I do? I am only ne in a nation which for centuries has onsidered the thing good and neces- ary."

"But science has proved that this thing neither good nor necessary. Rather at every one who takes it is doing me harm to himself!" broke in Har- rd.

"There I cannot agree with you; in rict moderation I think it perfectly ght and admissible. The Bible teaches at it is so, and the Church has al- wed it. The Founder of our Holy Re- gion turned water into wine, as His st miracle."

"But that was not intoxicating wine!" ied Harford.

"It is called good wine."

"Our Lord could not have called alco- lic wine good! True—science had t then declared alcohol to be a poison, t He knew all things, and do you think possible that He would make a poison- s drink, which injures men in body, ind and spirit?"

"You astonish me, Mr. Harford! What idence have you that the wine made Cana was not intoxicating?"

"I have the internal evidence of God's ord itself. It declares wine to be a ocker,' a 'deceiver.' How could the n of God make such an agent of de- uction, knowing as He must have the tal effects of alcohol on the human ce? I could not have faith in God if believed that He made it."

"But we have numerous texts which eak of wine as a blessing!"

"Yes, I know! there are twenty-four number."

"Really! I did not know there were so ny!"

"But there are seventy-one, containing rning and reproof against strong nk!"

"You have evidently studied the sub- t."

"Yes, it is of vital import to me. I g ago came to the conclusion that our rd was a total abstainer!"

Mr. Selwyn looked shocked.

"Is not that rather profane, Mr. Har- d?"

"No, the profanity seems to me to be those who can suppose the other in- pretation."

Angela was listening with her chin pped in her hand, her eyes going m one to the other.

"Well, how about the paradox of the ble, Mr. Harford? Wine is blessed, l wine is cursed in the same inspired it."

"It is very easy to decipher. There re two kinds of wine, one fermented, e other unfermented. The Hebrew nguage has nine words for wine, which have translated into English by the word. The Encyclopaedia Britannica s it is much to be regretted that our nslation should so poorly convey the iginal meaning."

"Yes, that is certainly a pity!"

"The Jews had processes for sterilizing e fruit of the vine that we know noth- ng of, and the juice of the grape was en taken freshly expressed into the y. It is these forms of wine which e spoken of as a blessing."

"But the fact remains that intoxicating nk is an agent for promoting joy and mfort, and our Lord Jesus Christ nctions all human enjoyment," said Mr. Selwyn.

"I cannot go so far as that. Has God provided so scantily for enjoyment, that we are dependent on a poisonous liquor for pleasurable sensation?"

"In moderation, my dear sir."

"As for moderation, who can judge what moderation is? One person drinks in moderation: the same amount makes a drunkard of another!"

"Ah, yes," broke in Angela, "I have noticed that!"

"I must be going," said Harford.

"Well, I shall think it over, and we can have a further talk," said the Padre.

When Harford had gone, Mr. Selwyn said, "I came specially to see you. You do not often come to Church, Mrs. Fortescue."

"No, I have been very little since I came to India; my husband has that day free, and he likes me to go out with him."

"But I think you would be stronger and better for it! We cannot afford to neglect the worship of God!"

"Yes, mother told me to go for help to God, and I want to do right. I will try to come every Sunday."

"And will you not also come to the Holy Communion? That is a source of joy and help and defense against evil."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it, and advise it strongly."

"Well, then, Mr. Selwyn, I will do as you wish. Is it every Sunday?"

"Yes, at eight and twelve o'clock. I advise your coming at eight, fasting."

"Fasting?"

"Yes; it is more reverent."

"Well, then, I will come at eight. You are very good to take an interest in me."

"You are one of my sheep, Mrs. Fortescue," the Padre said, with a smile.

"A wandering one, I fear!"

The next Sunday at eight o'clock Angela was present at the celebration of Holy Communion. She read the service attentively, and entered heart and soul into the prayers; with others she knelt at the rail to receive, and the words, "Eat this in remembrance that Christ died for you," fell like balm on her troubled soul.

But when the cup was brought to her neighbor, kneeling at her side, the smell of the alcoholic liquid smote upon her senses! An intense longing for the wine possessed her. She turned giddy and faint with the violence of the emotion, and grasping the cup drank up the small quantity left in it.

Mr. Selwyn started and looked at her in surprise; in his absorption in the service with eyes partly closed, he had not recognized the kneeling figure in the wide hat and with bowed head. When he saw Mrs. Fortescue, the color flooded his face in dismay.

Angela rose and left the chancel. Her eyes were bright with an unsatisfied look. She went immediately out and drove home filled with desire. As the smart victoria rolled along with its red and gold liveries, its occupant—the lovely girlish figure—evoked many admiring glances. But hidden from all was the burning passion which possessed her!

"Tell Divan Singh to come to me at once," she said to the bearer, as she alighted from her carriage.

"Good, Mem Sahib!"

She flung herself into a lounge chair, and tapped impatiently with her sunshade on the floor.

The dignified Divan Singh appeared.

"Huzoor!"

"Fetch me a bottle of champagne at once!"

Divan's eyes dilated, his face fell.

"There is none in the house, Mem Sahib."

"Why not?"

"It was left in camp by the Sahib's orders."

"Then fetch some from the nearest merchant's at once."

"Mem Sahib! it is the Lord's day. I do not buy."

Her eyes flashed. "Well, send some one. No! Ayah shall go. Ayah, Ayah," she called, "Come here."

The woman clanked into the room, her silver ornaments jingling.

"Fetch me a bottle of sharab! jaldi, jaldi (quickly). Here is the money," and she threw five rupees towards her.

The Ayah hurried off to the bazaar.

Divan Singh was almost beside himself! He paced up and down the compound, grief and indecision written on his face. In a quarter of an hour, the Ayah appeared with a bottle of brandy.

"Give it me!" he said, snatching the bottle from her. "Thou shalt not give the sharab to the Mem Sahib."

"I must: she waits for it."

"Thou shalt not!" and he dashed it against the stone wall near the gate. It broke, and the contents poured out. Divan Singh walked up to the bungalow, and the Ayah followed, trembling. Angela met him at the door.

"Mem Sahib, thy servant has broken the bottle. The sharab is bad, very bad!"

She sank down, trembling. "Oh, Divan, I'm ill, sinking down! down!"

The lovely face was agonized, and the sweet eyes looked for help in her distress into the sympathetic face of her servant.

"Thy servant will call his wife; she can cure the Mem Sahib."

He hurried off for Maryam, who came in with her gentle composure, took the girlish form and laid it down on the sofa.

"Fetch hot milk, quickly."

"The Mem Sahib has had no chhoti haziri (early breakfast)," said the Ayah, who stood by.

"She is faint for want of food," returned Maryam.

The hot milk was brought and administered, and Maryam, with soothing touch, massaged the hands and feet, and quieted the excited nerves of her mistress. She sank to sleep.

"Saved for this time, thank God!" said Divan Singh, to himself.

Insane Asylums Not Filled With Drinkers

In a recent letter to the editor of the Boston (Mass.) Herald, Rev. William A. MacNair of Cambridge, a Congregational pastor, refutes the statement of a court officer who was quoted as saying that prohibition is sending so many people to the insane asylums that these institutions are filled to overflowing with cases committed on account of drinking moonshine. Mr. MacNair wrote to several institutions for their records of commitments, and the figures, which follow, speak for themselves:

"The Medfield State Hospital reports that the patients first admitted in 1915 numbered 80 and of these 12 were listed as alcoholics. In 1916 three alcoholics were admitted, in 1917, two; in 1918, three; and in 1920, three. All of these were first admissions. The figures for readmissions do not differ materially from this list.

"The Taunton State Hospital reports the following list of admissions for alcoholic psychosis: In 1915, 49 were admitted; in 1917, 74; in 1920, 11; in 1921, 9.

"The superintendent of the Danvers State Hospital reports the table of percentages which follows: In 1915, of the total admissions 11.17 per cent were alcoholics. In 1916, 13.3 per cent were committed for alcoholism. In 1917 the rate was 9.8 per cent; in 1920, 4.9 per cent and in 1921, 8 per cent.

"The Westboro State Hospital reports the number of admissions thus: In 1915, total admissions—841, of which number 23 were alcoholics. In 1917 the total was 669, of which the alcoholics numbered 39. In 1920 the total was 374, and the victims of alcohol four. In 1921, 494 patients were admitted and of these 18 were alcoholics.

"Four great hospitals located in the eastern section of the commonwealth where the urban population is greatest and presumably the opportunity to get moonshine is also greatest, do not furnish warrant for the sweeping statement that the hospitals for the insane are full of people who have been made crazy by drinking moonshine. Facts are stubborn things and it looks as if the facts whenever they are carefully studied are against the wild statements of the wets.

Massachusetts Y. P. B. Hold High Powered Convention

refuted all arguments against law enforcement and the Volstead Act. The address was, for temperance workers, a veritable gold-mine of fundamental information.

At an evening session, Mrs. Ada Frisbee, editor of Our Message, conducted a gold medal contest. Of the deserving group of gifted speakers, Frank DeLuca of North End Y. P. B. was the winner.

The new state officers are: Ethel Frances Love, president; Forest A. Black vice-president; Miss Faulkner, corresponding secretary; Frank DeLuca, recording secretary; William H. Talbot treasurer.

The convention was treated to a fascinating and inspirational address by Mrs. Jeanette Mann, director of publicity for the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. She paid an especially fitting tribute to Miss Ella Gleason, president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U.

With its zeal for the cause, the Massachusetts Y. P. B. should be among the most successful in the country. We believe that we can do our full share in prohibition work, and propose to undertake even greater tasks during the next few months under our distinguished leaders. May the W. C. T. U. and Y. P. B. do much in His service!

Both the enterprises conducted by these up-to-date young women for the dispensing of wholesome, well-cooked food (instead of the poisons of ante-prohibition days) are money makers for managers and owners, and certainly greatly to be preferred to liquor bars.

ANTI-MORPHIN BILL PASSES BOTH HOUSES — PENNSYLVANIA WET CANDIDATES DEFEATED — ENFORCEMENT STRENGTHENED THROUGH SUPREME COURT DECISION — CHILD LABOR LAW HELD INVALID — HOUSE VOTES LOAN FOR LIBERIA

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Big Victory in Passage of Anti-Morphin Bill

The Jones-Miller Anti-Morphin—or, better designated, the Anti-Narcotic Drug Bill—passed the Senate Friday, May 12, having passed the House May 4. It has gone to the President.

So important did the senators regard this bill that no objections were raised when the tariff debate was set aside for the consideration of this measure, which passed without a dissenting vote.

The passage of this bill is a cause of much rejoicing. It is a measure which touches the general welfare of not only our own people, but the peoples of other lands.

The bill provides for a Federal Narcotic Control Board—composed of three principal Cabinet officers, the secretaries of State, Treasury and Commerce—to which matters relating to the traffic in drugs will be referred.

The New Law Not An Amendment to the Harrison Narcotic Act

The two countries producing the greatest amount of manufactured opium and cocaine and coca leaf products are the United States and England. Regulation of our exports therefore deals with but one-half of the problem of preventing manufactured drugs from reaching foreign lands which may make illegitimate use of them. England, while maintaining drastic export restrictions by licenses issued under the British Dangerous Drugs Act, has, by our previous faulty legislative treatment of narcotic drugs in-transit shipments, been unsupported by this country in enforcing British laws. By the enactment of this law the two principal producing nations of the world united in stamping out the illicit use of narcotic drugs the world over. Especially will this law be of more assistance to the people of China than of any other foreign country in their effort to heal themselves of a vice which threatens to deeply fasten itself upon them. It will, in a greater degree, however, save our own people from the activities of the smuggler and the illegitimate trafficker.

The law is not an amendment to the Harrison Drug Act (Act of December 17, 1914), but supports and strengthens the same from the manufacture and import angles. The administration of the Harrison Act supervises the distribution and prevents the unrestricted dispensing of narcotic drugs to addicts in the United States and its possessions. In no wise does it cover the field of exportation and in-transit shipments of narcotic drugs, nor does it limit the amount of imports or prevent importation. There are thus two distinct fields of remedial legislation and the new law relates to the latter field.

Pennsylvania Beer and Wine Candidates for Congress Poor Runners

Candidates running on wet platforms in Pennsylvania went down to defeat. Complete returns on the nominees are not available, but it is known that candidates who announced for beer and wine were overwhelmingly defeated. These are some examples: Congressman Burke, who included beer and wine as one of the planks in his platform, was defeated by Senator Pepper by over 200,000; in the Twelfth district, Harris Hamlin made beer and wine the dominant issue and was defeated by Congressman Clarence D. Coughlin; two candidates favoring beer and wine opposed Congressman Darrow, who was renominated by more than 4,000 votes; in the Twenty-ninth district, Otto Nick of Erie, running on a beer and wine platform, got only one vote in four, Congressman Shreve being renominated; in the Thirty-third district, Joseph Mayhugh, wet opponent of Clyde M. Kelly, received less than 4,000 votes and Mr. Kelly, a well-known dry leader, more than 10,000.

During the month of June primaries will be held in North Carolina, Iowa, Florida, Maine, Minnesota, North Dakota. Meanwhile, states in which conventions and primaries are not fixed by law will hold nominating conventions, including Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Maryland, New Mexico, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee and Utah.

Supreme Court Decision Makes Possible Better Enforcement

In a decision handed down May 15, the United States Supreme Court ruled that liquor while within the United States, in transit from one country to another, can be seized under the Prohibition Act.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by Justice Holmes, who referred to the danger of "leakage in transit," emphasizing the purpose of the prohibition amendment and the Volstead Act to prevent the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. The decision will be a great victory for prohibition enforcement. It means that millions of gallons of liquor which have been "lost" in transit en route through the United States to another country will not now have a chance to enter the country.

Justice McKenna with Justices Day and Clark gave a dissenting opinion. The question came before the Court under conflicting decisions in the lower Federal courts. The United States district court for Eastern Michigan held against seizure on the ground that the treaty with Great Britain and the revised statutes permitting such shipment had not been repealed by the Volstead law. In another case the United States district court of New York had held that such shipments were prohibited by the Prohibition Act, which abrogated a treaty and repealed prior statutory authorization.

Because of Tax Provision United States Supreme Court Holds Child Labor Law Invalid

The Federal Child Labor Law, which was held invalid by the United States Supreme Court last Monday, was enacted after the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional an Act of Congress which excluded from interstate commerce products in which child labor had been used. The law affected by the Court's decision this week was much the same, except that it imposed an excise tax of 10 per cent upon the annual net profits of establishments employing child labor. The law was attacked as being unconstitutional in attempting to regulate state functions. There was no dissenting opinion though Justice Clark noted a dissent.

States Duty of the Court

Declaring it the duty of the Court to decline to recognize or enforce laws of Congress dealing with subjects not intrusted to Congress, but left by the supreme law of the land to the control of the states, Chief Justice Taft, who read the opinion, said the Court must perform that duty, "even though it require us to refuse to give effect to legislation designed to promote the highest good.

"The good sought in unconstitutional legislation," he added, "is an insidious feature, because it leads citizens and legislators of good purpose to promote it without thought of the serious breach it will make in the ark of our covenant or the harm which will come from breaking down recognized standards. In the maintenance of local self-government on the one hand and the national power on the other, our country has been able to endure and prosper for nearly a century and a half."

There was nothing in the language of the Court to indicate anything but regret that it was found necessary to set aside this most recent provision of Congress. No great wrong can exist without its remedy. As long as states fail, through public sentiment or law, to protect the child, it is the duty of Congress to devise ways for such protection. Constitutional amendments have already been proposed through joint resolutions introduced in House and Senate by Representative Fitzgerald of Ohio and Senator Johnson of California.

President Signs Immigration Law

The bill passed by Congress to extend the 3 per cent Immigration Law has been signed by the President.

The bill limits within a maximum of 350,000 the number of immigrants admitted in any one year. The amendments extend the operation of the law for two years instead of one, from June 30 of this year, when the present law will expire; provides for a fine of $200 for every alien brought to this country in excess of his country's quota and for the return of his passage money by the steamship company, and extends from one to five years the period of residence required of an alien entering the United States from contiguous territory.

House Votes Loan for Liberia

Passage by the House of a resolution authorizing a loan of $5,000,000 by this country to the Liberian Republic, shifts the issue to the Senate.

United States Senate Adjourns Night Session for Pages

The Senate, which has been holding night sessions, adjourned one night session so that its twenty pages might see the clowns and elephants of the big circus in town this week. The pages were the guests of Senator Elkins of West Virginia.

Legislative Headquarters, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., May 20, 1922.

Dry Canadian Cities Note Decrease in Crime

"Canadian cities which changed from license to prohibition are having experiences similar to cities in the United States," says The American Issue, "—a big decrease in cases of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. Take Toronto for example. In 1914 when that city had licensed saloons there were 14,247 arrests for drunkenness and 2,734 for disorderly conduct. Last year under prohibition arrests for the same causes were 4,727 and 1,084, respectively, a decrease of nearly 66 per cent. In these seven years the population of Toronto increased 10 per cent.

"In that city in wet 1914 there were 1,074 cases of cruelty to animals and only 67 last year. There were 311 cases of child neglect in wet 1914 and 128 in dry 1921. Insanity cases dropped from 130 in 1914 to 74 in 1921."

Alcohol and Narcotics

Prohibition has not caused an increase in the use of narcotics; in fact, in the opinion of Colonel Will Gray Beach, United States narcotic agent in charge of the Chicago division, which includes the states of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin, narcotics are not being more widely used.

"I am aware that an effort is being made to show that prohibition has caused people deprived of alcohol to turn to narcotic drugs," said Colonel Beach, according to the Christian Science Monitor of May 8. "Such an argument is, however, utterly without foundation. I have been in this work from the beginning and if any such effect had been produced I would have been the first to know of it. The records of this office show nothing of the sort.

"The use of narcotics is not on the increase. There is a great deal of this evil to be fought and we are fighting it all the time, but we have not had more to do because of the prohibition amendment. I could not say that any effect on the drug situation has been caused by it in any way.

"In the first place it is not in the nature of things that the alcohol addict should turn to drugs. It is contrary to the experience of this office. The physical effects desired by the two types of addicts are entirely opposite. To one familiar with this kind of work it could be misled by any such argument." Colonel Beach is inclined to think that the belief that the use of narcotics is on the increase is fostered by the publicity the newspapers give every rumor of the sort, but that this kind of newspaper advertising does a great deal of good, as it keeps the public awake. "But as for prohibition having caused an increase in drug addiction," he said, "this office doesn't talk much for publication—we don't give interviews, but I can state my opinion and observation the same as anybody else, and you may say it from me—absolutely no!"

Safety Head Compiles Figures to Prove Dry Law Effective

According to the Everett (Wash.) News, Commissioner of Public Safety Charles A. Turner believes that the dry law is effective and has compiled figures taken from records at the city hall to prove his contention. Arrests for all causes in 1910, a wet era before local option was inaugurated, totaled 4,689, of which 792 were for intoxication. In 1921 the arrests for all causes totaled 2,414, of which number 292 were for intoxication. In 1912, a dry year, the total number of arrests for all causes was 2,661, of which 407 were for intoxication. In 1913, with the local option law quashed, the total number of arrests for all causes practically doubled, totalling 4,857, while the number of arrests for intoxication was three times as great as the preceding year, reaching 1,430. While figures for 1920 and 1921 show an increased number of arrests over the years 1917, 1918 and 1919, this is attributed by Mr. Turner to the greater use of the automobile and the resulting infractions of the traffic laws.

John Wanamaker Urges Enforcement of Prohibition

In a letter received a few days ago by the Philadelphia Law Enforcement League from John Wanamaker, the nationally known merchant and philanthropist heartily endorses the Eighteenth Amendment. We quote as follows:

"There can be no real difference of opinion regarding the necessity for the enforcement of this law, as well as any other law that has been placed upon the statute books of the nation. To enforce one and not another is to breed disrespect for all law, and weakens the whole fabric of our government.

"The prohibition amendment was adopted in the manner prescribed by our constitution. It was not a hurried proceeding, or taken upon snap judgment, but was long foreshadowed by the prohibition legislation enacted by the various states.

"It was peculiarly fitting that prohibition should have come previous to the amendment giving suffrage to the women, who are now our real partners in life. What a humiliation it would have been to have invited our mothers, wives and daughters to cast their votes in saloons, as was so often the case, and in an atmosphere of liquor and drunkenness.

"Personally, I believe in prohibition, because in a long experience I have seen the evil and degrading effects of the liquor traffic, and do not believe that it can be safely played with any more than can dope or dynamite.

"I do not think that the American people will ever want to go back to the old regime, but if there are those who think otherwise, the same orderly procedure is open to them that took place in enacting the prohibition amendment."

Legal Heirs to the Saloon

"The quick transition from the days of old John Barleycorn, when brewers made the thirst quenching amber fluid, to 1922, when their plants are devoted to the manufacture of confectionery," will be one of the features visualized at the candy show now being held in Chicago, according to the Daily News of that city. "The plant of the brewery which manufactured the 'beer that made Milwaukee famous' is turning out chocolates by the ton." Many other breweries in various parts of the country have also been turned into candy factories.

Mr. Walter C. Hughes, secretary of the National Confectioners' association, which is holding its convention simultaneously with the candy show, in commenting upon the statement so often made that the candy business is the "legal heir to the saloon," said, as quoted by the News:

"The greater gainer is the savings bank, then comes the soft drink business, the third is ice cream, and the fourth the movie and other theaters, with our industry as the fifth."

Prohibition Has Increased Sale of California Goods in East

Mr. James Reeves, proprietor of a chain of 300 grocery stores in New York City, who recently visited San Francisco, declares that prohibition has increased the demand for California canned fruits, according to the San Francisco Journal of Commerce. "Business is fine in New York City," said Mr. Reeves, "and we hardly know that the country has been through a depression. Our business this year will be over $20,000,000 gross."

The Pan-American Conference of Women

For women of twenty-two countries of North and South America all roads, during the last week in April, led to Baltimore, where, in the largest hall the city could furnish, that of the Century Theatre, over one thousand women from outside, in addition to those in the city, assembled to discuss all that has to do with human welfare—the care and education of children, safeguarding of women in industry, sound health and morals—the fundamentals that appeal to women of every clime and tongue. In the first session, one hour and forty minutes in length, twenty-two women, coming from all of the Americas, sundered in actual miles almost as widely as the north and south poles, spoke, each speech strengthening the note of unity which prevailed throughout all the conference.

Most interesting were the members of this company of women, a goodly number of whom were not only officially appointed delegates from their own governments, but were also specially commissioned to collect information on educational institutions and public organizations of various kinds in this country, which could be adapted to the needs of Central and South America.

The only continent where as yet women has not attained to the privilege of the ballot is South America, but the delegates from Brazil, Uruguay and Chile reported on their suffrage movements, Donna Bertha Lutz of Brazil telling of the bill now pending before the Brazilian Congress to enfranchise women. The six-day program was filled to the brim with enthusiasm, international friendliness and boundless interest. Government and state officials and educators, representatives of the Canadian, Central and South American countries, as well as prominent leaders of the women of the United States, addressed the immense audience.

During the last session of the Pan-American meetings a resolution was passed calling for a permanent organization, and the Pan-American Association for the Advancement of Women came into being, with the general aim of better education for all women, freedom of opportunity and responsibility, and particularly the promotion of "friendliness and understanding among all Pan-American countries for the purpose of maintaining perpetual peace in the western hemisphere." The officers are from the United States, Brazil, Panama, Mexico, Colombia and Uruguay.

INDUSTRY, DEMOCRACY AND EDUCATION

Part II. What You Can Do in Your Own Community

Laura Parks Miller, National Director

The national director of Women in Industry asks every union in towns of 10,000 population, or more, to give at least one meeting to this subject within the next year. The leader should know Part I. of this article (UNION SIGNAL, April 27, 1922) and all of Part II. The program should, however, consist of answers to the community questions given, and if possible to a plan of work for developing some local need shown.

One of the most striking criticisms of education in your community and mine came recently from the lips of a girl. She did not know that she was criticising. Slender and wide-eyed, barely out of her teens, she stood before the full convention of the Y. W. C. A., and told her own story.

She once lived at home in a small town. It failed to offer her either training for a decent job, or a job that was worth keeping.

Is Your Town Like That?

So at fourteen she had to go to the big city. There she still found no training for either work or life, save the training in hopelessness a buttonhole machine can give.

Does Your City Give Trade Training For Real Jobs, to Its Girls?

And then, last summer, after ten years of supporting herself, Letta Perkins had six weeks of study and discussion and conference, formal and informal, at Bryn Mawr College. Let her tell you in her own words some of the things she learned: "First, I learned what to eat and how to economize. I had spent too much money for clothes. I had not known what kind of food was best for me. I know now what is good for me to eat, and in the matter of clothing I always ask myself if I need the article to be purchased, and whether it is worth the price. I learned practical economy."

Isn't That a Training in Good Citizenship? Do Your Schools Teach It?

"I might place pockets on shirts for another ten years, but I have learned how to fill the gap with happiness and something of life," said Miss Perkins. "Before, I did not know anything more of Kipling or Tennyson than I knew of Smith or Jones. Now I know something of literature and the men who wrote the wonderful stories, and I have something bigger in my life than I ever knew before."

Why hasn't Letta Perkins taken advantage of the city night schools in the ten years she spent at the work bench? Perhaps the best answer is the experience of fourteen strong young college girls who, last summer, went into industry. Their jobs varied. One ran an elevator, another was in a garment factory, three did restaurant work; several went into domestic service, one into a laundry. But—"there had been a course of study planned for the girls during the weeks they were to work, and magazines and books were to be furnished and were furnished. Not a single one of the girls read any book or magazine. One girl read a part of a chapter in one book, during that time. The others did not read at all."

Even though these girls worked in a state which has an eight hour law for every occupation except domestic service, they were too tired to study at night. Yet these were young women, college trained, unusually ambitious. Evidently, fine as the night school is, it isn't enough.

Its disadvantages are clear. Teacher and pupil are usually tired and sleepy. Attendance is irregular. Night work may force pupils to be absent for days or weeks. In one week 112,000 registered in New York City night schools, while the average attendance was only 41,000. The evening school usually reaches only the young, the bright, the ambitious (2). As the Workers' Education Bureau secretary writes in a personal letter, "Our night schools have tended to attract only the white-collar man."

Has Your Community Even a Night School?

If so, is it teaching what its pupils want when they have sacrificed so much to come? Here is the course Letta Perkins and ninety-nine other working girls will have at Bryn Mawr this summer:

4 hours—Economics.

2 hours—English Composition and Public Speaking.

1 hour—Hygiene.

The remaining four hours may be chosen from the following courses:

English Literature, History of Civilization, Psychology, History of the Labor Movement, Government—"The Citizen and the State." Science and Music.

Is Your Community Teaching Practical Economics In Any Such Proportion of Time, to Either Prospective Employers or Employees?

Perhaps it will prove impossible to get immediately such "revolutionary" courses into your public schools and mine. (How long was scientific temperance teaching condemned as revolutionary?) There is a simpler movement on foot in most states and cities to have practical vocational or trade training given boys and girls who have drifted into work, or who naturally would slip into a job between 14 and 16. Even the employer who hires these youngsters at bargain rates has begun to find them a poor investment. And Miss Jane Addams, knowing thousands of them, has her viewpoint of the moral dangers. She finds that both the boy and the girl, who leave school untrained, at 14, drift into blind alley jobs, which hold no interest. There, often, the boy "throws up his job" (5) and "tends to become the workman of least value, the first to be dismissed." Or, "three times out of ten" fourteen-year-old John and Jane, in sheer restlessness, drift into and out of six places each the first year. Says the writer of "The Long Day" of her own experience: "For sad and terrible though it be, the truth is that the majority of 'unfortunates,' whether of the specifically criminal, or of the prostitute class, are what they are, not because they are inherently vicious, but because they were failures as workers..... They did not like to work not because they are lazy—they are anything but lazy—but because they did not know how to work" (6).

Are Your Schools Making Moral Delinquents?

So three sorts of education for the worker are being carried out. That which workers themselves choose, as illustrated in the Bryn Mawr course, is one.

Vocational training for the boy and girl is carried on in some public schools for those who have not yet gone to work. Says the United States Bureau of Education (7):

"Education has always consisted of work and study and play, and children must not be deprived of any of these three elements in their education, if they are to grow in health and strength and develop initiative, intelligence and the ability to think for themselves..... The modern city is depriving children of the opportunity for the healthy, wholesome work and play which are essential elements in their education. The city home, whether in a large or small city, is very unlike the farm with its many necessities for 'learning by doing'..... The city not only fails to educate children in the right direction; it educates them in the wrong direction, for the street, with its dangers to the physical and moral life of the chidren, too often becomes their only playground. And street play means not education in health and strength and wholesome living but precocious education in all the vicious side of a city's life. ... The city school must return to the children the opportunity for the helpful work and play which the home can no longer supply. It must provide playgrounds and shops and laboratories and drawing and music rooms, as well as classrooms, where they may be kept wholesomely busy all day."

Does Your Community Thus Combine Child Welfare and Women in Industry Work In School?

Our own Mrs. Fannie Taylor of Kansas City reports, from a national meeting attended (8):

"Special training is needed for doing anything well, whether it be keeping house or selling a spool of thread. The importance of vocational education in this country is shown in the fact that the government now spends $7,000,000 annually in this work, each state duplicating any amount it may receive from the government. One goal is 'A Trained Homekeeper in Every Home.'" Only about one per cent of homemakers in the United States are trained. The housekeepers comprise the largest number of employed women in any one class in this country and the smallest per cent are trained.

Vocational training is also carried on by many employers. These "vestibule" schools vary from some of the best free training courses available, with free English and other literature subjects, to mere attempts to depress wages by increasing the "trained labor" supply.

Does Your Community Support Public Part Time Schools?

The United States Government has since 1917, given funds for trade and industrial education. All appropriations must be met by an equal appropriation by the state (9).

Has Your State a Part Time School Law

This money is spent not only for "day trade classes" in the public schools but also "to increase the trade and technical knowledge of those already employed through part time and evening schools. These are schools for those who have already gone to work. The part time school compels school work, by law, on the employers' time and pay, for young workers. Four hours a week is usually trade training, English and citizenship the courses. The part time school is new in America. It is little talked of. Wo

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. HOLDS "OPEN HOUSE" AT NEW HEADQUARTERS BUILDING—MANY FRIENDS CALL TO EXPRESS CONGRATULATIONS—JEANNETTE RANKIN, FIRST WOMAN MEMBER OF CONGRESS, SPEAKS AT LOCAL UNION MEETING PRECEDING INFORMAL RECEPTION

Reception Room of New National W. C. T. U. Headquarters

"The National W. C. T. U. must be doing a record-breaking business today," remarked a passer-by, as she observed the procession of men, women and children thronging into the "world-famous backyard" of Rest Cottage. "Everybody seems to be going there."

It was true. Almost everybody worth while—husbands, daughters and sons, cousins and aunts and uncles, from Evanston, from Chicago and environs—responded to the invitation to attend the informal "at home" last Friday afternoon, at the new National W. C. T. U. headquarters building, and to felicitate the national general officers upon the completion of their beautiful new office home. There was only one regret to shadow the joy of a perfect day—that all of the half million white ribboners of the United States could not be present.

Preceding the informal reception, the local unions of Evanston held a meeting in The Willard, adjoining Rest Cottage (where National W. C. T. U. Headquarters were formerly located), Miss Jeannette Rankin, the first woman member of Congress, speaking on "The Minimum Wage Law." Later, those in attendance joined the company that came to pay their respects to the national officers and to see the new building.

So rapid and continuous has been the growth of the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union during the past few years that a new headquarters building had become an absolute necessity. The rooms occupied by the national officers in "The Willard" were quite inadequate for the larger work they are now called upon to do. Ground was broken August 8, 1921, the day the national officers started for the national convention at San Francisco, but not until a few weeks ago was it ready for occupancy.

The new building is connected with, and stands a little in front and to the south of, the Literature Building erected in 1910. Of red pressed brick and with white trimmings, it is three stories in height, with light, roomy basement. The third floor is not finished but can at any time be put in condition for use as a storeroom or for other purpose. Inside, the building is finished in oak. It is a substantial yet artistic piece of architecture, manifestly a house built for serious business but withal having a homelike atmosphere not found in the ordinary commercial establishment.

May we personally conduct you, white ribbon comrade, through this, your new official home. As you approach the entrance, you look up at the windows of Frances Willard's "den" just opposite and pass the wonderful giant horse-chestnut tree, grown from seed planted by Miss Willard. As you enter, you find yourself in a well-lighted lobby, and marvel at the spaciousness of the building, with its picturesque open stairway, its corridors to right and left, and its general appearance of roominess.

Turning to the right, you step into the office of the managing editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and your eye falls upon the picture of the statue of Frances E. Willard as it stands today in Statuary Hall, Washington—Frances Willard, the great editor-in-chief of the official paper that she loved to call "the letter from home," whose influence and spirit still inspire its messages. Here, too, is a fine picture of that statesmanlike leader, Lillian M. N. Stevens, another great editor-in-chief, and over the managing editor's desk the face of Anna Adams Gordon smiles down upon the visitor. Adjoining is the office of another member of the staff, and across the hall the cosy workshop of the associate editor, bright with long streams of yellow galley proofs, for it happens to be "make-up" day and next week's issue is in process of completion. Having seen THE UNION SIGNAL in its first stages, you are eager to inspect the Circulation department, and hasten down the corridor to the south where the manager of that department will take you through its suite of five rooms, explain the card catalogue system by which the history of your subscription is carefully kept, will introduce you to the mysteries of the machines which make the stencils and print the names and addresses for THE UNION SIGNAL and Young Crusader. She will call your attention, with pride, to the fact that each week these papers go to subscribers in over forty foreign countries, and will ask you to inspect the file room, with its stacks of SIGNALS waiting to be sent out.

On your way back to the lobby, at the left of the main entrance, you must stop to speak to the managing editor of The Young Crusader, whose pleasant, sunshiny, well-equipped office you will immediately recognize because of the numerous pictures of bright faced laddies and lassies.

Turning to the right of the stairway, you walk into the stock room of the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, where if you are like most callers, you will exclaim at the extent and variety of the literature displayed on the shelves. Leaflets for the young and old; posters in black and white, and in colors of the rainbow, music in sheets and music in song books—a veritable arsenal of total abstinence and prohibition ammunition wherewith to wage war against King Alcohol and John Barleycorn, and bring to pass his complete annihilation. All day long a corps of workers wrap and address parcels of literature to be sent to every state in the Union. You will be tempted to tarry long in this storehouse of information and inspiration but you must hasten on to regions yet to be explored.

If you have harbored doubts of the appropriateness of the term "home," as applied to the new headquarters building, they will quickly disappear as you reach the top of the stairway and find yourself in the "heart of the home," the reception room, with its luxurious couch and easy chairs, its table spread with books, papers and magazines, its piano with music open upon the rack, its banquet lamp shedding a soft rose-colored glow, and the benignant face of Frances

LEADING MEN OF AFFAIRS GIVE THEIR VIEWS ON PROHIBITION

Discussion of the Question from an Economic and Moral Standpoint

(Excerpts from Publication of Manufacturers' Record)

The views of hundreds of manufacturers, bankers, lawyers, physicians and educators as to the vital relation of prohibition as an economic factor in the welfare of the country as well as the moral issue involved, are most strikingly presented in an 84 page book entitled "The Prohibition Question, Viewed From the Economic and Moral Standpoint" which has just been issued by the Manufacturers' Record. It is well nigh impossible out of the hundreds of letters which have been received to make any summary which at all presents the amazingly strong arguments advanced for prohibition by manufacturers and others. But picked at random here and there as indicative of hundreds of similar statements in letters equally strong from leading manufacturers, all of which will appear in full in "The Prohibition Question" are the following brief sentences:

Judge Gary of the United Steel Corporation in reply to a questionnaire as to whether he is still opposed to the liquor traffic to the extent that he was when he signed a petition to Congress some years ago, heartily commends prohibition and writes:—

"Yes, results have fully justified prohibition legislation," and he says that he can see no reason to change his opinions.

In closing his statement Judge Gary adds that drunkenness is not as common at present, so far as he can learn, as under the open saloon and free liquor traffic.

R. A. Cochran, treasurer of the Maysville Cotton Mills, Maysville, Kentucky, reports that there "are no longer any blue Mondays in their factory on account of drinking, as formerly, and that the saloons in their neighborhood have given place to grocery stores, and the boys are growing up without forming the habit of drink."

The Canton Malleable Iron Co., Canton, Ohio, reports that there is "no question that accidents have been reduced in their plant and that they would dread to see the day when liquor of any kind would be put into general use again."

John C. Haswell of the Dayton Malleable Iron Co., Dayton, Ohio, says "drunkenness is not as prevalent as formerly, and there is a decrease in the vast numbers of absentees from drink as before prohibition." He is "opposed to the liquor traffic per se, opposed to it because it is a violation of the laws of the country, and because wherever you find trouble you usually find liquor."

J. J. Phoenix, president of the Bradley Knitting Co., Delavan, Wisconsin, says, "Better living, better clothing, cleaner and better social life, happier homes with more contentment, better and steadier workmen averaging more efficiency and with less sickness and lost time, are some of the benefits to the workers and to society in general. Drunkenness is not one-twentieth as much as in the days of the open saloons." Like many others he denounces the violation of the prohibition law, and says, "If the so-called wealthy men of affairs will not respect the laws of our country, why should we complain of the bootlegger and illicit distiller?"

In a careful compilation of all replies received by the Manufacturers' Record on the prohibition question, the following remarkable results appear:	Per Cent
For Prohibition in Some Form	98.50
Against Prohibition	1.50
For Strict Prohibition	85.50
For Beer and Wine	7.00
Against Volstead Law or Present Regulation	1.25
Wants Volstead Law Modified	.75
Advocates High License or Government Control	1.00
Advocates Dispensary System	.25
Undecided or Noncommittal	2.75

Vice President Seltzer of the Ohio Cultivator Co., Bellevue, Ohio, writes: "Prohibition is unquestionably the greatest thing that has happened in many years. Many laboring men have paid their bills, have been able to buy clothes for their families, and have started bank accounts since prohibition came into effect."

Vice President Fancher of the Fifth Avenue Bank of New York, reports that "prohibition has been far-reaching in its effect and in the benefits already derived. Those who are raising the most objections to it are the people who take a rather narrow and selfish view."

President North of the American Soda Fountain Co., of Boston, reports that all "employers, even from a purely economic standpoint, regardless of their personal opinion, will agree that prohibition has been beneficial both to the workmen and business," and he reports that "so far as his observation goes in clubs, hotels and other public places, drunkenness has decreased so far as to be almost negligible!"

General Sales Manager Sibley of the Birmingham Clay Products Co., a former president of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, basing his statements on thirty years of experience in the mineral regions of Alabama, contrasts "the awful and tragic conditions prevailing in the days of the open saloon, with crime, and poverty and their brood of shame, crime and suffering, inefficiency, ignorance and disease" with the present "living conditions so vastly improved; where peace and happiness prevail as a rule in family life, and the children are enjoying greater and better educational opportunities than ever before. Drunkenness is almost obsolete and would be entirely but for the persistent efforts of the bootleggers. From an industrial standpoint alone the employers of Alabama have found prohibition one of their most valuable assets, as well as a safeguard to property and persons of themselves and of employees."

The Gulf States Steel Co., of Birmingham, reports a decrease of at least 75 per cent in accidents as a result of prohibition.

H. B. Smith, secretary of the McInnes Steel Co., Corry, Pennsylvania, says, "Prohibition has done wonders in this city for the working men not only in reducing accidents, but in bringing their people to a higher standard of citizenship. With the liquor traffic out of existence the workmen and their families are enjoying to the full extent what th American home stands for."

Louis C. Walker, president of the Ae motor Co., manufacturers, of Chicag Illinois, writes that "even partial enforc ment of prohibition has demonstrate that a thorough enforcement would brin to the women and children of the lan a greater blessing than any other la we have ever enacted," and he adds, ' am unable to understand how any ma who will give the subject thorough co sideration is willing to jeopardize thi blessing to the women and children i order to satisfy his own personal desire for alcoholic stimulants."

William E. Follansbee, president of th Follansbee Bros. Co., steel manufa turers, of Pittsburgh, reports that the e perience in their operations from th abolition of the liquor traffic has prove prohibition to be recognized by all se tions and people in all conditions o life, and adds, "none are more appreci tive of the benefits than those who ar ordinarily designated as working people.

E. H. Campbell, mining engineer, o Iron River, Michigan, reports "a decreas in the number of days of absence fror work due to accidents of 68 per cent Investigation in a large organizatio near by showed similar results."

A. M. Todd, president of the A. M. Tod Co., manufacturers, of Kalamazoo, Mich igan, writes that he believes that no na tion can prosper so long as the liquo traffic is permitted to exist, and he re gards the present prohibition law as th most important act of legislation i America for the present century.

President Gillespie of the Lockhar Iron and Steel Co., Pittsburgh, report that their "experience under prohibitio has made them more determinedly op posed than ever to the liquor traffic. Th men are saving money, buying homes and providing for their families the com forts of life as never before. Laborer no longer go to the polls partly stupefie by liquor to vote at the behest of th saloon politician, and the younger gen eration is being trained in habits of so briety."

President Hodge of the Kalamazo Paper Co., Kalamazoo, Michigan, says "The cause is really winning, and t allow light wines and beers to be mad would be to unlock a door which is nov securely locked. With a population o 50,000 the banks and merchants are un animous in the opinion that men are sav ing more money and paying their bill more promptly, and drunkenness is no nearly so common as it was."

Lindsay Brothers, Inc., manufacturer of agricultural implements, Milwaukee Wisconsin, report that even with imper fect enforcement of the new laws pro hibiting drinking, and the large foreig population, the advantage of the ac seems beyond question, and drunkenness is not as common as before the act.

STATE TEACHERS COLLEGE

VALLEY CITY, NORTH DAKOTA

"North Dakota has always been a prohibition state and her people are generally, if not almost unanimously, in favor of prohibition. I am sure that the teachers and students of this institution, and all the state institutions generally, are in hearty sympathy with the Eighteenth Amendment and wish to see the Volstead law enforced as thoroughly and as efficiently as possible. Teachers and students have no sympathy with the idea that because the law is violated by a few people, it should be repealed."

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

EVANSTON, ILLINOIS

"The faculty and students of Northwestern believe in prohibition in theory and believe that no form of crime was ever reduced so rapidly as that of drunkenness.

"People still carry concealed weapons, they still steal, and they still drink, but drinkers are being reduced in number much faster than the other classes of law-breakers. There is practically no drinking among our students."

"I have no means of determining what the faculty and students of Harvard think of prohibition in theory and fact, as there has not been a vote on this question. So far as my own personal acquaintance goes, more men are for prohibition than against it, but I have no means of knowing whether this is true of the university as a whole or not. I have heard several members of the faculty express the belief that prohibition was a good thing on general social and national grounds, even though it interfered with their own comfort and convenience."

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA

"I do not know that it is profitable to discuss the theory of prohibition. It is beginning to be a fact and is more of a fact as time continues. There isn't any question but that college administration is easier under present conditions. The drink problem in student life has almost disappeared and will soon be a thing of the past. Having been for many years in active work with students, I can say without hesitation that the benefits of prohibition to American colleges and universities have been great.

"Lest I should be misunderstood I want to add that the problem has not entirely disappeared, but with continued vigilance it will disappear and that will be a blessing."

OREGON AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE

CORVALLIS, OREGON

"As you, of course, know, prohibition in Oregon was voted by the people some time before the Volstead Act was passed by Congress. Under a state option law, Benton county, in which we are located, had been 'dry' for a number of years prior to the time when prohibition was adopted by the state. In fact, it has been some twenty years since saloons were voted out in this county.

"There is no division of sentiment among the members of the faculty on the question of prohibition, either in theory or fact. The student body, numbering upwards of 3,800, also accepts it as a matter of course, and, so far as I know, there is no sentiment among the students against prohibition. So far as we are concerned, prohibition is no experiment; it is an established fact. To go back to the open saloon would be regarded as a calamity."

PURDUE UNIVERSITY

LAFAYETTE, INDIANA

"The result of the prohibition years is a clear demonstration that both in 'theory and in fact' it is working well from a university standpoint. The whole problem of discipline has been both simplified and lessened; the morale of student bodies has been improved and the number of men dropped because of misconduct greatly reduced. What is true of the university is also true of the community in almost as marked a degree. Even lax enforcement of the law cannot obscure its value. I am very confident that a large percentage of my colleagues upon the faculty would subscribe to these statements."

Acting Chairman of the Faculty.

UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY

LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY

"I am very glad to say that, so far as I have been able to observe, the University has gained greatly by the prohibition law. The city of Lexington has improved in appearance, new stores have taken the places of the old saloons and grog shops, and as a consequence the temptations to students have been materially reduced. Again, we have felt the past two years that the problems of discipline have been reduced by half."

BOULDER, COLORADO

"I think there are very few, if any, men engaged in the work of education who are genuinely concerned for the welfare of young people during their student lives, who do not welcome the strictest enforcement of the prohibition law.

"A good many years ago, long before national prohibition went into effect, and some years before prohibition went into effect in Colorado, we were blessed here by the exile of all saloons from Boulder. At once we had occasion to see the good effects of this upon the members of the student body.

"I do not think the matter is open to debate at all."

GEORGE NORLIN, President.

March 29.

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

MADISON, WISCONSIN

"I will say that my impression of the faculty and students of this institution is that they accept prohibition in good faith and resent the disposition to set the law at defiance. Of the few colleagues I have talked with, the prevalent opinion is something like this, 'It is too bad to interfere with the drinking habits of a large element of the population, but we had to get rid of the saloon for it had become a plague spot.'"

E. A. ROSS, Professor of Sociology.

March 6.

OTTAWA UNIVERSITY

OTTAWA, KANSAS

"Let me say there is but one opinion and that is most positively in favor of prohibition. Of course there are violations of the prohibitory act; so are there violations of the law against stealing and against murder, and it appears to me that the argument built upon the lack of strict enforcement has the same force as when applied to any criminal law. I do not think that there is any force that could induce Kansas to go back to the open saloon."

National W. C. T. U. President Is Speaker at Luncheon to Lady Astor

At a luncheon given to Lady Astor by the Illinois League of Women Voters, last Monday at the Congress Hotel, Chicago, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was represented by its national president, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, who extended to the noted member of the British Parliament the greetings of the organization. When in London for the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in 1920, Miss Gordon was the guest of Lord and Lady Astor at a luncheon in their home.

Don't Fail to Vote at the Primaries

It is the first duty of every citizen to vote at the primaries. Why? Because the primaries are for the express purpose of letting the people indicate directly how they shall be governed and by whom they shall be governed. Now is the time to scrutinize the records and reputation of candidates. Next November will be too late. The time to find fault and to sift the competent politician from the incompetent, the honorable from the self-seeking, the good from the bad is now—AT THE PRIMARIES.

Do They Believe It Themselves?

The question has been asked before, and it is one which must often arise, as we read or hear the arguments made by the wets in defense of the return of light wines and beer. It occurs again to the mind in reading the report of Dr. Lemchen, one of the physicians of the Chicago state hospital for the insane, situated at Dunning, Illinois. Although one of the stock arguments in the present wet campaign is the emphatic statement that because of prohibition there are many new alcohol addicts, the doctor says that "as a rule, all the people who at present are using moonshine have used alcohol before." He quotes from the records of several cases. "One patient was a heavy drinker till the country went dry. From that time he did not drink until a couple of weeks before he was admitted, when he met a friend who gave him moonshine." Others had worked regularly until two or three weeks before admission to the hospital. These stories show that the prohibition law had proved most effective until in some weak moment these patients had been encouraged to partake of moonshine, with disastrous results. Whether or not prohibition pays, then, depends upon the enforcement thereof.

She'd Taken Prohibition for Granted!

An up-to-date high school teacher writes of the stimulus she recently received to define more clearly her belief in the value of the national prohibition law. The local W. C. T. U. had offered prizes for the best essay on "Prohibition and Prosperity" and in order to give her pupils the necessary preparation, she devoted one class period to a free-for-all discussion on the topic. When she endeavored to meet the arguments some of her pupils presented, she discovered, as she naively remarked, that she had taken prohibition for granted and was without the necessary data to substantiate her claims for the anti-alcohol law. Determined to fortify herself, she went home, hunted up UNION SIGNALS of the past three months and studied them religiously until she became well equipped with facts and figures bearing on all phases of the subject.

In common with the high school teacher, many long-time advocates of prohibition are making the discovery that when pressed in argument to tell definitely the reasons why they believe prohibition is worth while, they are able to answer only in glittering generalities, which sound well but are not likely to convert the sceptic to a belief in the practical value of prohibition to society.

Today, every W. C. T. U. member needs to be a bureau of information, with mind and memory equipped with the latest, up-to-date facts concerning the benefits of prohibition—evidence that will be admissible in a court of law. Let her not be content to "take prohibition for granted." It might be well for her to conduct, in her own community, an investigation to ascertain the basis for her conviction that prohibition is desirable for her own city. Let her read, study and assimilate the evidence that is given each week in THE UNION SIGNAL, carefully noting the statements of industrial leaders, published by the Manufacturers' Record, and those from presidents of colleges; the utterances of mayors of our big cities, health officials and social welfare workers given in this and other issues. When somebody says, as somebody will be sure to say in the coming days, "Prohibition is a sad failure. Nobody believes in it," she will be ready to meet this foolish utterance with the unanswerable testimony of prominent business men, officials and educators that prohibition is a success and an asset of pronounced value.

Let us, in season and out of season, talk up the well substantiated benefits from the Eighteenth Amendment until we make vain and futile the movement to repeal the national prohibition laws.

A Good Suggestion

The Champion of Fair Play, an Illinois liquor journal, in a recent issue makes a suggestion which prohibition forces everywhere would do well to consider and to act upon, as, indeed, they have done in some states. Speaking of the prohibition law this paper says: "This law must be replaced, and the only chance will be the defeat of the men who voted for prohibition, replacing them by men who will favor the repeal of the same..... Here are the men who voted for the prohibition law. See if they represent your district and go for them." Then follows the roll-call on the Illinois prohibition act.

Do you know the men who voted against the prohibition law in your state? Do you realize that they stand for the enemy of the home, the church, the school, and do you intend to "go for them"? Do you dare stand for them?

In the same article Fair Play quotes a notoriously wet candidate as saying that the "tide against the national prohibition laws in the east and south is such that the states in those sections will elect Congressmen at the next election on nothing but anti-prohibition issues" and that from a dozen to twenty will "be in the House for nothing else but to repeal the prohibition laws."

We may well be spurred on to our highest and best efforts to counteract the endeavors of the foes of prohibition, but we, contrary to their method, will fight in the open, remembering with gladness, as they cannot do, that "God is on our side, and that God is a power."

National W. C. T. U. Holds "Open House" at New Headquarters Building

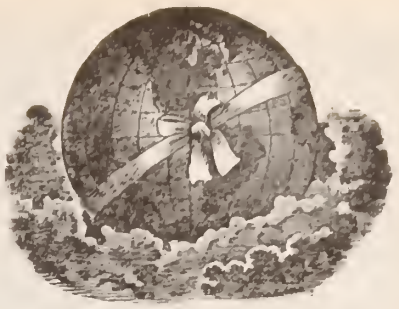
Willard smiling a benediction. Not for long can you linger in this delightful corner, as you are urged to proceed on your tour of inspection to the office, at the right, of the manager of the literature department, and her assistants, busy eight hours of every day, entering, filing and conducting correspondence concerning the countless orders. And where, you ask, are the leaflets prepared for publication? You find the answer in the sunny northwest corner room, where the editor of literature prepares the manuscripts that later go out in leaflet form to sow seed thoughts of total abstinence and prohibition the nation over. Across the hall from her office is the library where are to be kept the archives of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union from the days of the Crusade to the present time. Near at hand is the room occupied by the national publicity director, with her secretary, from whose office go out to the press of the nation stories of W. C. T. U. achievements and of prohibition's progress.

You are growing impatient to meet the national general officers, and they are as eagerly awaiting you. We come first to the sanctum of the national corresponding secretary, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, with the office of her secretary opening to the north. Greet the presiding genius of this room with the slogan, "Mobilize a Million Members" and you will bring to her lips a smile of delight. Speak of the unique map of the United States upon the wall, the famous W. C. T. U. spot map, tiny black headed pins indicating the local unions, and you will make her happy. It is from this office that the plans for the Million Members Campaign go out to the Trio Teams of state and county and local unions. It is to her that each mail brings encouraging reports of increase in membership. The very atmosphere tingles with enthusiasm for the membership campaign.

On the opposite side of the hall we find the national treasurer, Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, and her secretary. If a "Million Members" is the open sesame to the heart of Mrs. Parks, a Milllon Jubilee Dollars will bring the sunshine into the face of Mrs. Munns, for she deals in dollars, not the ordinary, commonplace kind, but consecrated, blessed dollars, earned and collected by white ribboners for the upbuilding of the kingdom of the Master. She's adding them, those sacred dollars, on the business like machine you see by the side of her desk, and she's spending all her waking hours and far too many of those intended for sleep in planning how to conserve, and then to invest to the best advantage, the money sent in to further the work.

You may have been wondering where in this big new building the national president, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, is to be found. We are at her door, opposite that of the treasurer, and ninety-nine chances out of a hundred, before you cross the threshold, she is coming forward to meet you and greet you. Visitors have said of Miss Gordon's room that "it is a dream". Truly it is a room of dreams—dreams and visions of a whole world emancipated from a great evil, dreams of a world made safe and homelike, of a beneficent law enforced and made a blessing to all humanity. From the front window of her office, Miss Gordon can look into the windows of Frances Willard's "den," and across the avenue to the home of the president of Northwestern University, beyond which lie the blue waters of Lake Michigan. But the vision of the president extends to the uttermost parts of the earth and observes the needs, hopes and aspirations of her white ribbon comrades the world around, always with a desire to meet their needs through the organization which she leads. Around the beautiful mahogany council table, in the center of the room, the national general officers meet to make plans and decide important questions relating to the work. It is not merely a pretty fancy but a significant fact that when the national president, acting for her co-officers as well as herself, presses the button in this office, the wheels of the W. C. T. U. machinery in every state, every county, every local union, begin to turn, and there are set in motion plans of vital moment to the interests of society and portentous to the forces that are trying to undo the work of Christian women of the last half century. From this office the women of the United States are being mobilized in the greatest campaign of the century, to talk, to pray, to work for the observance and retention of the Eighteenth Amendment, and the law that makes possible its enforcement. You will not leave headquarters without an increased enthusiasm for the campaign into which we have been plunged by the attack of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, and a new consecration of all your ransomed powers to help win at the polls, November 7, a victory that shall transcend all other victories.



Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

America Befriend

O Lord, our God, thy mighty hand
Hath made our country free;
From all her broad and happy land
May worship rise to Thee;
Fulfil the promise of her youth,
Her liberty defend;
By law and order, love and truth,
America befriend.

The strength of every state increase
In Union's golden chain;
Her thousand cities fill with peace,
Her million fields with grain;
The virtues of her mingled blood
In one new people blend;
By unity and brotherhood,
America befriend.

Through all the waiting land proclaim
The gospel of good-will;
And may the joy of Jesus' name
In every bosom thrill.
O'er hill and vale, from sea to sea,
Thy holy reign extend;
By faith and hope and charity,
America befriend.

—Henry van Dyke.

Prohibition Not a Failure, Says Commissioner Haynes

A great law enforcement rally has just taken place in Detroit, Michigan, fifty meetings being held simultaneously in the various churches of the city, where city, state and national speakers assailed attempts to nullify prohibition laws, and condemned breakers of them.

Federal Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes addressed a crowd that taxed the capacity of the large auditorium of the North Woodward M. E. Tabernacle. Speaking of the advance made in enforcement even since the beginning of the fiscal year, Commissioner Haynes said, as quoted by the Detroit News:

"More than 10,000 convictions for the violation of the prohibition law have been obtained in the last nine months. It would not be strange if some of the hue and cry, 'prohibition is a failure' might have arisen from some of the very ones who have felt the force of the law, either in the temporary loss of their liberty, in property losses, or in the loss of their social standing.

"So long as enforcement officers could be easily bribed; so long as the traffic went on unimpeded by either taxes, fines, or jail sentences, so long as only the small offenders were brought to justice, there was little cause for the insidious propaganda that finds large space in that portion of the press that is still hostile to prohibition and its enforcement. Among the most subtle and deceptive of all the propaganda directed against the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment is the persistent cry that the law is unpopular and can not be enforced; that it is being flagrantly violated and therefore should be repealed. The contention is that because this law is violated, it puts all law in jeopardy, and tends to develop a spirit of defiance toward all our laws. It does not take a keen intelligence to see that this contention itself is subversive of law enforcement and is the veiled confession that any law that is unpopular with a minority of people, may be held in disregard, and if the Government accedes to this demand a precedent is established against the enforcement of any law, rendered difficult of enforcement because of adverse propaganda."

Stickers

If the efforts of reformers are to be successful, their work must not be done spasmodically in the enthusiasm of the moment. The destructive forces are working twenty-four hours per day, three hundred and sixty-five days per annum. The reformers must become "stickers" to their job. The committee for the World's W. C. T. U. convention have discovered a method by which every temperance worker may become a twenty-four hour worker for the cause. Just enclose $3.00 for a thousand or 50 cents for a hundred and say "Stickers," to

HONORARY SECRETARY WORLD'S W. C. T. U. SENDS TO WHITE RIBBONERS MESSAGE CONCERNING COMING WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

The following letter was written by one of the honorary secretaries of the World's W. C. T. U., Mrs. Blanche Read Johnston, especially for the white ribboners of Canada. She wishes the message to extend even further and reach every member of the W. C. T. U. the world around. THE UNION SIGNAL is very glad to publish it and thus give it a wide reading.

Mrs. Blanche Read Johnston

We are hoping you are coming to our World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention to be held at Philadelphia, U. S. A., November next.

Our United States sisters are making plans, many and complete, for the comfort and happiness of their world-wide guests. Their generosity and enthusiasm are only exceeded by their glowing hospitality. We in Canada know very well our "cousins across the line" as we familiarly say.

The "line" is significant, stretching four thousand miles between our two nations. Fifteen hundred miles of it consist of the world's greatest inland waterway. But for over one hundred years no battleship has been anchored in those flowing rivers, or great inland seas.

Not a fortress stands sentinel along our border, nor has the sound of weapons of war been heard: nothing more formidable on guard than revenue officers of both countries!

We bid you all a thousand welcomes! We hope many of you will assemble in the lovely Quaker City of William Penn. There you will hear glorious stories, radiant with victory and golden-hued in hope and confidence. Miss Anna Gordon's fascinating travels in South America and other lands; Miss Agnes Slack's splendid achievements in the reorganizing of our work in war-stricken Europe; the records of triumph of the leaders in many countries; and the example of a great republic living under a Prohibition Law are worth coming far to hear and see.

Many of you, because of local, national or home duties, cannot foregather, and I would like to suggest a way in which all our dear white ribbon sisters—even in remotest parts of the world—may be present in heart and spirit.

In the realm of prayer, distance makes no difference. The petition may be like radio broadcasted upon the prayer waves and reaching away to the heart of God, presented to Him as incense (Rev. 8:3, 4), returning in abundant comfort and blessing to those who pray, and in power, wisdom and illumination upon the convention.

May one suggest a few specific subjects?

1. That in all deliberation Christ may be King and Lord, and have preeminence, as His glory is the first consideration.

2. For our leaders, that wisdom, tact and knowledge may be given for the solving of the tremendous problems.

3. That important questions to be debated and decided may have the illumination of the Holy Spirit shed upon their solution; that every decision may be made in the light of our high calling in Christ Jesus.

4. That journeying mercies be given all our delegates and visitors.

5. That those who "stay by the stuff" may be protected by our heavenly Father in happiness and peace.

Begin now, dear friend, to create an atmosphere of prayer and attitude of expectancy.

Oklahoma Overrides Obstacles

Mae A. Thompson

Oklahoma launched a series of group meetings carefully planned to be held at some certain places comparatively easy of access to every organized section of the state. Beginning at Oklahoma city, February 27-28, our state president, Mrs. Josephine M. Buhl, conducted a state institute, and with our two national directors of Child Welfare and Women in Industry, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, as her able assistants, set a pace that was most gratifying to all privileged to be present. Oklahoma was in the grip of the worst weather of the winter, which hindered the attendance. The keynotes of the sessions were: first, that we recognize Christ as our co-partner and source of all our power; second, that we win more men and women to our ranks; third, that we keep ever on the alert for law enforcement opportunities; fourth, that we emphasize the Loyal Temperance Legion, the Young People's Branch, and the Child Welfare department as essential to community life and the perpetuation of our cause. The most salient points of our departments were emphasized by our state chairman, Mrs. Alice M. David, and her capable corps of efficient superintendents. The state chairman of county presidents, Mrs. Lilah D. Lindsay, was at her best, with many practical suggestions for developing our state through the county unit. The climax of the meeting was reached at the banquet when seven of perhaps the most representative workers for law enforcement that ever met together on such an occasion in our capital city, discussed the lax conditions that prevail, and the best and most effective means of dealing with offenders.

With subsequent floods and a tie-up in traffic, some meetings were necessarily changed and others postponed. With all these hindrances, our intrepid state president, accompanied by her own and her foster daughters, Bettie Louise and Miss Grace, made the rounds of nine groups, filling in intervening dates wtih very successful meetings. Mrs. Alice M. David, state vice-president, accompanied Mrs. Buhl on the first lap of the trip and stayed behind to hold one postponed group meeting. Mrs. Abbie B. Hillerman, honorary president, assisted in the latter part of the work. Wonderful meetings resulted at every point, and the spiritual uplift gained cannot but stimulate interest and advance our cause over the state.

"The Law Is Defied—Repeal It!"

Under the above heading the Philadelphia North American, in a recent editorial, shows with clear, relentless logic the fallacy of the argument which claims that the prohibitory laws should be repealed because they are violated. Speaking of banditry and of how far-reaching and prevalent has become this form of lawlessness with its attacks upon human life and property, the editor says that through the inability of the police authorities to cope with the situation two menacing conditions have resulted: First, criminally inclined persons are losing all respect for the law and the agencies of enforcement; and, second, law-abiding citizens are losing faith in the power of the government to apply the statutes. And nothing will tend more swiftly to undermine public order than repeated demonstrations that laws can be violated with impunity. "Many remedies for the growing evil have been urged," he continues, "—that all good citizens carry arms; that police forces be enlarged; that more courts be established and the penalties for robbery made more severe. But is there not a simpler and more direct solution? If the laws against banditry were repealed, it would no longer be a crime, and hence conditions which are undermining respect for those laws would disappear."

In the same way the laws against stock swindling should be repealed. "Surely it would be better to erase statutes which are impudently violated than to continue a situation which permits solemn enactment to be flouted and which undermines public respect for authority!"

There are many people who disregard the marriage laws of the land. "The rising generation is being taught that the contract which once was deemed sacred and inviolable need present no formidable obstacle to one who wishes to break it. Nothing, of course, could do more to bring a law into contempt than universal knowledge that it can be disregarded at will.

"Must this alarming condition be tolerated? If the laws interfering with individual proclivities toward divorce can be evaded and set at naught—and notoriously they can be, and are—what is there to do but repeal them? Shall we keep them on the statute books to be mocked, and thus permit respect for law to be undermined?"

Automobiles are continually being stolen. "Glancing around again, we perceive that the multiplication of automobiles has led to the organization of a new and elaborate system of crime. Laws against car stealing are strengthened, penalties made more severe, but the deterrent effects are small, for the police cannot keep pace with the thieves, and rising insurance costs show that the criminal industry is growing more efficient. The laws against stealing automobiles are plainly held in contempt by the criminal classes, and are no longer relied upon by owners of cars. Let them be repealed ere all respect for them evaporates!"

"As for the laws against drugs, we are aware that there is a great industry which flourishes in spite of them, and in order to supply a demand those who sell drugs are driven to the necessity of becoming law-breakers, criminals!

"Furthermore, these laws make it difficult and costly for persons to indulge appetites to which they become accustomed. What becomes of personal liberty when the government seeks to deprive individuals of something which satisfies a craving and relieves gnawing miseries? With the laws forbidding the open sale of narcotics violated everywhere and every day, is there not an invulnerable case for their repeal, and for the transforming of the drug traffickers from criminals into law-abiding citizens?"

"We hasten to disclaim the glory of having originated this line of reasoning," the editor concludes. "We have merely suggested some logical implications from the contention that a law which is widely and defiantly violated ought for that reason to be repealed, lest it and all laws be brought into disrepute, and in order that its violators may become orderly citizens.

"And the remarkable fact about this demand is that it is not directed against laws which have become obsolete or have outlived their usefulness, but against the most recent of important enactments. The prohibition law, which they want repealed because it is not, they say, effective, is part of the Constitution of the United States. It has been ratified by forty-six of the forty-eight states; through affirmative action of ninety-four of the ninety-six legislative chambers. The enforcing act was passed twice by overwhelming vote in both houses of Congress, the second time over the President's veto; it has been strengthened by the present Congress, and will have greater support in the next. It has been sustained in every particular by decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and fortified by statutory enactments in every state in the Union.

"It is being violated, defiantly and by wholesale; there is no doubt of that. But so are the other laws we have mentioned. It is comparatively recent in enactment; only lately has it begun to have anything like a fair trial.

"If we are to accept the principle that widespread violation of a law requires its repeal, in order that disrespect of law may be avoided and criminals may be changed into good citizens, we urge that in all fairness a beginning should be made with some of the earlier prohibitions. After society has been benefited and law observance has been restored by repeal of the palpably ineffective statutes against robbery, stock swindling, crooked divorces and drug peddling, the case for repeal of the outlawry of liquor will be simply irresistible."

A Feast of Good Things

Clara C. Clayton, Vice-President Nebraska W. C. T. U.

The date set for the Central City (Nebraska) conference, found the central part of the state recovering from the effects of a great blizzard, and the attendance was not as large as had been expected, but the delegates made up in enthusiasm for the lack in numbers, and the program abounded in good things.

Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director of Americanization, and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, national director of Women in Industry, gave splendid evening addresses along their particular lines of work, and were present most of the following day to give their hearers the benefit of their rich experience in many other phases of the work.

The Membership and the Star in the Window campaigns, the budget system, Christian Citizenship, and scientific temperance were all ably dealt with, and a whole morning spent in the discussion of law enforcement.

Mr. U. S. Rohrer, Federal prohibition director, discussed the Federal law, and all who heard him felt that the temperance people had made no mistake in asking for his appointment. Rev. F. A. High of the Anti-Saloon League, explained the Nebraska enforcement law, and the responsibilities of the school, the church, the official, the W. C. T. U. were emphasized in the discussion that followed. Plans for work in the July primaries were perfected, and the legislative committee determined upon a campaign of education preparatory to securing during the next legislative session a better marriage law.

A Stainless Flag

The cry rings out o'er all the land to-day,
No more let greed and vice on manhood prey!
Oh, let our name for truth and honor stand,
The land of justice, of the helping hand;
No more let sordid greed the laws control,
Nor vice, unstayed, degrade the nation's soul.
The emblem of a noble nation's life,
True sign of power that hushes war and strife,
Give us a stainless flag, men of the nation;
Drive out the greed for gain,
Let rum no longer reign; strive that our land obtain
A stainless flag.

—E. S. Lorenz.

Why He Is a Prohibitionist

Whenever a new question arises I ask myself first what eventual effect it is going to have upon our national life. I am at root a strong national individualist and have an abiding conviction that we are soon to become the dominant nation of the world—being not only its greatest manufacturing, financial and carrying nation but its greatest naval and military power. In this connection I might say that my fundamental objection to the creation of the League of Nations has been that such a league would become a power greater than are we, and it is my wish that there shall be no power greater than the United States.

As I have said, I have never been a prohibitionist. I have used wines and liquors freely and have served them liberally at my table, and when restrictive measures were about to go into effect I purchased a reasonable stock for future use and gave no more thought to the matter. When letters came asking me to take part in a movement for the rescinding of the prohibition amendment, I put to myself the question mentioned above. I then ran over in mind the causes that in our country work to make good or bad citizenship, to make a weak people, given over to self-indulgence with its entail of poverty, disease, crime and insanity, or a prosperous, self-respecting and vigorous people free from the unnecessary evils of life. I saw at once that drink was the chief cause of bad citizenship, and made up my mind that as an American who takes his citizenship seriously I could take no part in a movement which has for its purpose the perpetuation of the evils to which I have referred.

There are plenty of examples of what prohibition is doing for the people generally. Take Edgerton, our neighboring city, for instance. When there were ten saloons in the place it was no infrequent thing for 17 persons a night to be up before the court for intoxication or as the Scotch have it, for being "drunk and incapable." Seventeen was the full number the jail held. Last year in Edgerton there were 19 cases of drunkenness in the courts. That is quite a change from 17 in a night.—Janesville (Wis.) Gazette.

The truth is, of course, that the enemies of prohibition, who are still active and alert, are bound and determined to use any means to gain an end. And, as has been said before so many times, it will pay the earnest and conscientious citizen of this country to be ever on his guard to prevent the recurrence of the days when the American saloon and its evil influences cast a shadow over every home.—Nebraska (Neb.) Press.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, he is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Pitying her, he tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. At a small dinner she meets Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb. He encourages her to resist the appetite which has been held in check during her mother's visit, but it is roused by the fermented wine at communion, and only the refusal of Divan Singh to let her have liquor keeps her from being again overcome.)

CHAPTER XVI.

The next morning Angela was quite herself again. Among her notes of invitation, for she was a persona grata in the station on account of her position and beauty, she found one from Harford, asking her to join a set of tennis-players in the Club grounds that day.

She thoroughly enjoyed tennis, and was a fair player, and the thought of Harford being of the set gave her pleasure.

"We might play tennis three times a week, if you have time," said Harford at the end of their game.

"Oh, that would be delightful! I'll refuse all invitations if you will fix the days."

"I am going to dine at the Club tonight," he said later, as they parted; "my menage has broken down."

"What is the matter?"

"My khansama has a drinking bout on, and I can get nothing cooked."

"Are you going to get rid of your khansama?"

"Yes, I'm obliged to, for he rages about in a murderous mood, threatening to kill some one."

"We have just discharged a drunken cook who was quite different; he lay like a beast, dead drunk. Such an awful, odious creature."

"Strange how alcohol maddens some, and brutalizes others; it causes paralysis of the brain, however, in every case."

"Talking about servants, we have such a good kitmatgar: he saved me yesterday!"

"What do you mean?"

"I went to Holy Communion fasting, as Mr. Selwyn advised, and there was seized with an intense desire influenced by the smell of the cup. I rushed home and ordered champagne; there was none! So I sent for brandy. Divan Singh broke the bottle and would not let me have any. His wife, a sweet creature, gave me hot milk and massaged me to sleep."

"I am glad to hear that. Divan Singh must be a treasure! God has given you a friend in your own house."

"Yes, indeed, I am thankful! And there is Dr. Kathleen Scott, also. She is a strong friend and then I have you," Angela replied, looking gratefully at him.

"Oh!" said Harford, "of course you can always reckon on me if I am near; but tell me about Dr. Scott; I saw her with you."

"Did you not admire her?"

"She looked capable and refined."

"And handsome, too?"

"Yes, but that is hardly the word to describe her; neither is 'beautiful' nor 'lovely.'"

"Well, what is the word?"

"I can't say now; wait till I see her again."

Dr. Kathleen Scott was in her dispensary, which opened by glass doors into a back veranda. She was busily engaged in preparing a particular medicine which she could not trust to her dispensers. Suddenly a voice outside smote upon her ears—voices in loud altercation. One, a woman's, she recognized as her Ayah's, the wife of her bearer. It was raised in angry remonstrance.

"I tell thee thou dare not do it."

"If thou wilt not give me rupees I will!"

"But I have no rupees—bad, ungrateful son as thou art."

"Then, mother, thy son willl have his revenge on Harford Sahib; he will not give a chit, and I can get no place."

"Thou art mad, Sulaiman; thou drinkest sharab and wilt not do thy work. Ah, me! ah, me! that this mother should live to see the day!" Then in a whisper came the words, "Hush, boy! the Miss Doctor Sahiba will hear thee."

"Chup rao thyself, woman! What care I for the Miss Sahiba, she is only a woman!"

"Tell me then what is thy plan?"

"Harford Sahib goes tonight on business to the village of Hardi; he will ride alone. I shall be there also."

"Nay, nay, my son, do not this wickedness; thou wilt be lodged in jail!"

"Give me money then." The voices died down, and there was silence.

Kathleen thought swiftly. "I must catch this man, and I must warn Mr Harford."

She sent for the police, and went at once to her desk and wrote down what she had overheard, with the man's name—Sulaiman. Then she sent a letter to Harford.

His answer came back, thanking her for her kind warning, saying that his work demanded his presence in Hardi but he was strong and able and would go armed. The man was his cook, whom he had discharged for drunkenness and assault.

About three o'clock next morning Kathleen was awakened by the chowkidar (watchman), hammering at her door. She listened and heard voices and feet in the veranda. Then a nurse entered with the tidings that an injured Englishman had been brought into the hospital.

"But why here? He should be taken to the Station hospital."

"He is bleeding badly from a wound in the head, and the police brought him here as the nearest place."

Kathleen hastened into her dressing gown without a thought as to whom the stranger might be, intent only on her professional work.

The patient had been placed in a small private room, close to the veranda, which was occasionally used for Europeans. Two nurses, one on each side, were binding up the head of the unconscious man when Dr. Kathleen hurried in.

"Why, it is Mr. Harford! That man must have carried out his threats!" She turned suddenly to the two policemen who had carried him in, and were waiting for possible "bakshish."

"Have you got the culprit?"

"No, Miss Sahib; he was gone when we found the Sahib on the ground bleeding."

"Go," she said sharply, "and find him, or I shall report you." Then she gave all her attention to the wounded man. The injuries had evidently been committed with a club on the back of his head. Taken unawares, he must have been felled suddenly to the ground.

"A case of concussion, I fear." He lay unconscious and breathing heavily. Towards six o'clock he seemed partially to regain consciousness and became very restless. Dr. Kathleen feared fever, but treating him for this symptom she left him in the hands of the nurses, not caring to cause him distress by recognition of her. She sent for the Civil Surgeon, Colonel Green, who came in to find the patient conscious, but in a feverish state, and suffering much pain in the head.

"You must decide upon that; in his present condition I think it unadvisable. Please report to me, and I will make the necessary 'bandobast' (arrangements)."

Colonel Green decided at once that it would be very unwise to move Harford, and told her that he would send a European nurse, and attend him until he was able to be moved home.

He then returned to Dr. Scott and gave her a prescription. "No doubt you can make it up here," he said. And he added, as an after-thought, "Give him a tablespoonful of brandy three times a day."

"Please withdraw that; I do not use alcohol here, and I am told Mr. Harford is an absolute abstainer."

Colonel Green frowned and said stiffly, "I am his medical attendant, I think?"

"You are, but this is my hospital. I shall be glad if you will observe my rule; there is no need for brandy."

Colonel Green bowed. "Excuse me, but I shall send it in a medicine bottle, and give my nurse instructions."

Dr. Kathleen said no more.

The nurse arrived. It was an anxious day, for Harford's condition became distinctly worse. Colonel Green was again sent for. He looked at the chart of ascending fever.

"You have given him the brandy?" he asked the nurse.

"No, sir, the patient refused to swallow it. Each time he upset the spoon."

"Very well, don't trouble him, but send for me if he grows worse."

This did not happen, and in the morning Harford appeared better. He took food so well that Colonel Green reported to Dr. Kathleen that he was out of danger and might be removed on the morrow.

The improvement was maintained, but the patient objected to the removal. "I shall be best here, and am in good hands."

That evening Dr. Scott discovered her Ayah crouched on the ground and rolled up in her chadar, moaning piteously, "Ari! ari! my son! my son!"

"Your son has been caught, then?" The Ayah struggled to her knees, and clinging to the hem of her mistress' dress, cried,

"Ah! Miss Doctor Sahiba! mercy! Ask the Sahib to forgive—it was sharab (drink)."

"But your son is wicked, he must go to prison—there he will learn to leave off the drink. Don't cry, Ayah, a year in jail may cure him! But how did he learn to drink? I thought you were Mohammedans!"

"He was taught to love sharab when a child by the gorah-log."

"By the soldiers, do you say?"

"Yes, by the white soldier people. He run errands and make clean boots and fetch arrack—rum—bad, wicked water, and soldier give him to drink; now he love it!"

"Well, be glad, my poor woman, that his bad ways are stopped for a time. He will come out of jail in better health, and perhaps with a better mind."

Several quiet days worked wonders. When Harford was able to be dressed, he sent for Dr. Scott.

She came in, cool and fresh in her linen dress and cap. Her sweet, strong presence seemed to make an atmosphere of health in the room.

A sense of peace and protection grew in him. He tried to thank her for her hospitality and "first aid to the wounded."

"You are very headstrong," she said, in a reproving tone. "I mean, that you did not take my warning and keep out of this mess."

He laughed. "You see, we fellows think so much of our own physical strength."

"And you thought it was only womanish fears on my part."

"Don't be hard on a fellow when he is down," he said, touching his bandages.

"You appear to me to be very much up," she said mischievously.

"Well, Dr. Scott, I have two favors to thank you for. Believe me, I am grateful; but before you go," for she was moving away, "may I ask you a question?"

"Certainly."

"Did you order that brandy, which the nurse tried to give me?"

"Of course not, I am an abstainer! this is a temperance hospital. I did not prescribe; you were in the hands of the Civil Surgeon, remember."

"Do you never give it?"

"Never."

"Ah, that is good; I congratulate you on your strength of mind."

"Why?"

"Because alcohol is given so universally."

"I look upon such treatment as not 'up-to-date;' the best medical testimony is against it."

"You are right, but there is such ignorance of the nature of alcohol. Fancy giving it in a case of concussion!" He became quite excited.

"Don't talk any more. Good-bye, make haste and get well."

"May I come some day and go on with this talk?"

"Do, it will please me much." She gave him her cool hand and a warm smile. She had reached the door, when a note was handed to her, marked "Immediate." She stood still and read it, then turning to Harford, "This is to summon me to Mrs. Fortescue. She is ill and has sent for me."

"What is the matter?" asked Harford, anxiously.

"She does not say, but it is urgent. I must go."

"Wait a little, Dr. Scott. Do you know she has a craving for alcohol?"

"Yes, I know. My cousin, her stepfather, told me and asked me to watch over her. How do you know it?"

"I came out with her on board the Persia; she had it given on board by a friend as a medicine, and was found in a state of intoxication."

"Poor child! Oh, this enemy of the race! How it attacks the brightest and best! But I must be gone,"

"Send me word what is the matter," he cried after her.

She nodded and took her departure.

His thoughts for the next hour were not of Angela and her woes, but of the sweet, strong woman who had ministered to him.

"She is not beautiful, nor handsome—no, something better than either; there is an intensity of life, an energy of intellect on her face—in her voice. I know she is capable of higher heights and deeper depths than any woman I have ever known, and I feel as if I had known her all my life," he said to himself.

Make the Law Supreme and Its Violation Dreaded

It is undoubtedly true that the flagrant violations of the prohibition laws—the very apparent fact that an army of men find setting the law at defiance highly profitable in a financial way and not particularly dangerous—is increasing lawlessness generally. When those who are criminally disposed see any law held in contempt, they are quick to take it for granted that the law is weak. In a sense they are right, and it is because they are right that the forces which stand for law and order are demanding that more teeth be put in the statutes—that the law be made terrible for those who hold it in contempt.

Increasing lawlessness has brought the country to the point of alarm. And when folks get alarmed they get busy with preparations for protecting themselves and their property.

That is what the law-abiding citizenship of this country is doing now. It will not surrender its heritage without a fight. Either the law must be supreme or lawlessness will be.—Albany (Ga.) Herald.

One important essential quality of Americanism is obedience to the laws, a respect for the majority. That is the basis of all nationalism. If one lacks that there is nothing on which the structure of Americanism may be erected. The man who does not observe the laws of America is not 100 per cent American. He is not one per cent American or one-tenth of one per cent. He is no more American than the anarchist who frankly tells us that he is against law, not merely the laws that are personally distasteful to him but all law.—Phocnix (Ariz.) Republican.

Mrs. Campbell of Johannesburg, South Africa, tells us of the use made of THE UNION SIGNAL. She says: "I am enclosing money order in payment of four subscriptions for THE UNION SIGNAL and two subscriptions for THE YOUNG CRUSADER. They are all renewals. I should be very sorry to give up either paper as I have found them of very great use for many years, especially THE UNION SIGNAL; also many others to whom I send my papers value them highly. One union uses THE UNION SIGNAL in its meetings, then passes it on to a minister's wife who uses it in her Christian Endeavor meetings and also in Sunday school work."

GOOD NEWS!

A letter from Ellen A. Dayton Blair, promoter for THE YOUNG CRUSADER for Southern California, sends us 122 subscriptions to THE YOUNG CRUSADER, secured in ten minutes at a county convention by Miss Margaret Bilz and herself. Splendid work. Then comes more good news. We will give it as sent to us: "We are doing fine L. T. L. work. We expect Southern California to be the banner L. T. L. state at the next National Convention, having already doubled and tripled our membership this year."

We should keep constantly in mind that we are working for the future as well as the present generation, and the child of today is the leader of tomorrow. As Edgar Guest so beautifully expresses it:

"Some day the world will need a man of courage in a time of doubt,
And somewhere, as a little boy, that future hero plays about,
Within some humble home, no doubt,
that instrument of greater things
Now climbs upon his father's knee or to his mother's garments clings.
And when shall come that call for him to render service that is fine,
He that shall do God's mission here may be your little boy or mine.

"Some day the world will need a man!
I stand beside his cot at night
And wonder if I'm teaching him, as best
I can, to know the right.
I am the father of a boy—his life is mine to make or mar—
And he no better can become than what my daily teachings are;
There will be need for someone great—
I dare not falter from the line—
The man that is to serve the world may be that little boy of mine."

Quiz: Prohibition Propaganda

1. Has prohibition caused an increase in drug addiction?
2. Name the "legal heirs to the saloon."
3. In a four-minute talk show the relationship between industry and education.
4. Quote some of the percentages given by the Manufacturers' Record showing that business men favor prohibition.
5. Give five of the arguments for the retention of prohibition advanced by prominent business men in the United States.
6. What does the president of Coe College say about prohibition and education?
7. Quote presidents of four other colleges on the subject.
8. Should you "take prohibition for granted"? Give reason for your reply.
9. How may each member of the W. C. T. U. help make the World's W. C. T. U. Convention a success?
10. "The law is defied; repeal it." Follow out the argument to its logical conclusion.

What Is a Saloon?

Miss Georgia Hopley, first and only woman general prohibition agent, while addressing the Washington Independent Order of Rechabites on law enforcement, noticed many children present, and took advantage of the opportunity to impress upon them the improved conditions under prohibition.

"I am especially anxious to enlist the interest and assistance of children," she said, "as I realize that the child of today is the citizen of tomorrow."

Miss Hopley, in her talk, cited many points which the children could appreciate, that 64,000,000 pounds of sugar had been used annually in the manufacture of drink, and $2,000,000,000 in grapes; that it is estimated that while 2,500,000 people are addicted to drink today, formerly there were 20,000,000 and $2,000,000,000 spent yearly for rye, corn and barley. Church statistics show an increase of 1,000,000 members in the past two years, and there have been outlawed 177,790 saloons, 1,090 breweries and 2 distilleries.

At the conclusion of her address a present brought to the platform two little girls, of five and seven years, and presented them to Miss Hopley, saying:

"My little girls were asking me what a saloon is and wanted to know if it is a drug store."

"I have been spoken of frequently in the newspapers throughout the country as being the 'first' woman general prohibition agent," said Miss Hopley, "and now I think I have to my credit being the possible 'first' to call forth the question as to the meaning of a saloon. President Harding, you know, has said that in another generation liquor will have disappeared from our memory, but we had not figured on this query quite so soon. I am now even more fully convinced that much may be accomplished through the children."

Wine and Beer Not Wanted by All Ex-Saloon Men

While unfortunately many proprietors of former saloons who are now running soft-drink places are no doubt using their places of business as a means of supplying illegal as well as legal liquid refreshments, this is by no means true in all cases. And to those who are abiding by the law the proposed beer and wine amendment has no appeal, at least from the commercial viewpoint.

One of these owners of soft drink places is quoted by the Mt. Clemens (Mich.) Leader in a recent issue as follows:

"I do not think the saloons will ever stage a come-back in Michigan, and if they do come back the business would have no appeal to me. I don't want to see a return of the saloon, and I know of a number of proprietors of soft drink places who feel the same about it. We are conducting soft drink places and do a good business. We do not handle intoxicants in any form. Our places are quiet and orderly—recognized as 'clean' by many men who spend their leisure hours in our establishments. There is no rough talk, no quarrels, and profanity is rare. We appreciate the new atmosphere, and we are doing well financially."

PROMINENT BANKER NOTES SUBSTANTIAL INCREASE IN SAVINGS DEPOSITS UNDER DRY LAW

"Since the date on which National Prohibition went into effect the savings deposits of this bank have increased approximately $10,000,000, or thirty per cent," writes Mr. John Jay Abbott, vice-president of the Continental and Commercial Trust and Savings Bank of Chicago. "There is no question but that prohibition has contributed very substantially to the increase of savings in the United States, and therefore has been of great economic value to the country."

GRAND CHIEF BROTHERHOOD LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS ENDORSES PROHIBITION

I am opposed to the entire question of the manufacture and sale of liquor, because I look upon it as the basis and foundation of ninety per cent of the crime and criminals we have today..... I find (under prohibition) a marked improvement in the number of men who are saving their money and who own or are buying their homes, and also in the home life of the workers due to the fact that the women and children have more food, more clothing and better care..... I can truthfully say that drunkenness has decreased at least 75 per cent among the workers.

Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief,

EMPLOYER FINDS CONDITION OF WORKMEN AND FAMILIES VASTLY IMPROVED UNDER DRY REGIME

Having to do with the handling of workmen, I can see the wonderful difference now and before prohibition. Monday now is as stable a day with us as any other day in the week. Before prohibition Monday was a day of absenteeism. Besides, our men are happier all the time and I know by careful census that their families are infinitely better situated and happier in every way. They live better, reside in better houses and most of them have a little money in the bank.

STUDENTS NO LONGER TEMPTED AT EVERY STREET CORNER BY OPEN SALOON, UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT AFFIRMS

There is less drinking among college students in this part of the country than ever before within the memory of man. When they do drink, the stuff now sold has most alarming effects, but as a habit, drinking has very greatly decreased since the introduction of the new law. To me, it is a great satisfaction that students can now go up and down the streets of our city without being solicited at every corner by the open saloon.

DR. ROYAL S. COPELAND, NEW YORK'S HEALTH COMMISSIONER, BELIEVES PROHIBITION A GREAT FACTOR IN UNITED STATES' "BEST HEALTH YEAR"

Prohibition has no doubt played a very important and no uncertain part in the health condition. This conclusion is reached as follows: We are informed by the police and court records, in the matter of minor offenses, that there has been a marked amelioration of conditions. Savings banks inform us that the number of depositors has materially increased, and in a report recently made relative to absenteeism in industry, we see a very material improvement, in a big reduction both in labor turnover and in absences. While it would be difficult to scientifically draw an accurate conclusion, these conditions make us feel that in a broad way anything that is generally helpful to groups of people is specifically helpful to public health.

COMMANDER EVANGELINE BOOTH OF THE SALVATION ARMY SAYS WORKERS REPORT INCREASED PROSPERITY AND DECREASED DRUNKENNESS

"Everywhere our workers have found a marked increase in thrift and prosperity and a decrease in drunkenness," says Evangeline Booth in the New York Times, basing her announcement on answers to a questionnaire sent secretaries of the Salvation Army, in all parts of the country. "Cases of drunkenness are now the exception among men who frequent our hostelries, shelters and industrial homes..... In one hostelry it was reported that 120 men who have never been known to keep a dollar more than twenty-four hours now have bank accounts of considerable size. In another hotel twenty-five men of the sort who before prohibition could not keep a dime now have deposits ranging from $100 to $500."

Maryland Only State Without Prohibition Enforcement Law

Maryland is the only state minus a state enforcement law. Until a few days ago Rhode Island shared this undesirable distinction, but, in a phrase of Representative Volstead, "Rhode Island has joined the Union."

At present Maryland is the "black sheep." California has referred her enforcement code to a vote of the people and it is the hope that this will be approved at the fall election; the opposition to prohibition in Massachusetts is agitating for a referendum on its enforcement law.

This is the way the states line up for prohibition:

What Is the Truth-in-Fabric Bill?

The Truth-in-Fabric Bill was introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress and reintroduced in the Sixty-seventh. The purpose is to "prevent deceit and unfair prices that result from the unrevealed presence of substitutes for virgin wool in woven fabrics purporting to contain wool and in garments or articles of apparel made therefrom."

The bill is sponsored by Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas and Representative Burton L. French of Idaho.

Virgin wool means wool that has never been spun previously or woven into cloth. What is "shoddy"? It is the wool fibre obtained from clippings of old rags, furs, feathers, hemp, etc.; it is spun and woven into cloth and the fabric made does not have the endurance of virgin wool fabrics. "Shoddy" is what oleomargarine is to butter, a substitute, and in the case of shoddy it is sold as the real thing, often at prices of virgin wool, to an unsuspecting public.

One may eat as much oleomargarine as he wishes, but he does so knowingly, for the Federal law requires it labeled, either "not butter" or "oleomargarine." So the French-Capper Bill, if made a law, will not prevent the selling of shoddy-made garments, but proposes to make it possible for one to buy pure woolen garments or shoddy ones and pay for them accordingly. All fabrics would be plainly marked as to exact per cent of shoddy or virgin wool that may have been used in the manufacture of the garments.

The adulterations and misrepresentations of foods forced our government in 1906 to pass the National Food and Drug Act. As this was necessary so is the need for legislation for virgin wool.

The Truth-in-Fabric Bill should pass. It is Capper S. 779, now in Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, Albert B. Cummins of Iowa, chairman, and French H. R. 64, now in House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Samuel E. Winslow of Massachusetts, chairman.

The National Foreign Bureau Association and the National Grange are using their best efforts to induce Congress to pass this bill.

Anti-Lynching Again to the Front

Interest in the Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill, which passed the House last January and is now before the Senate Judiciary Committee, continues, and petitions in its behalf are being received in increasing numbers by senators. Mrs. Thomas G. Winter, president of the Federation of Women's Clubs, Miss Jane Addams and Mrs. Corinne Roosevelt Robinson are among the signers of a petition presented to the Senate last week by Senator Lodge. The list of names was an unusual one, including 24 state governors, 38 mayors of principal cities—Charleston, S. C., San Antonio, Tex., and Louisville, Ky., being among the number—3 archbishops and 85 bishops and churchmen—all denominations—47 jurists and lawyers, 19 judges and justices of the highest courts in various states, 29 college presidents, and many prominent citizens, including Henry Van Dyke, Edward W. Bok and Moorefield Story, former president of the American Bar Association.

Some of the members of the Senate committee considering the bill believe it, in its present form, unconstitutional. Informal conferences with the House committee are in progress.

Congress Provides For Tablet For D. A. R. Hall

"As a token of appreciation for making available Continental Memorial Hall for the sessions of the Conference on Limitation of Armament," Congress adopted a joint resolution authorizing the President to present a tablet in the name of the government of the United States to the officers of the Daughters of the American Revolution and appropriating $350 "for the expenses of producing a suitable tablet in conformity with this resolution."

The tablet will be a valued acknowledgment and a reminder to future visitors to Continental Hall of the fact that it was both the pleasure and the privilege of the Daughters to turn over their building to the government for the holding of the Conference, as they have done on many previous occasions for international ceremonies of dignity and solemnity, though never before for a gathering of such high significance.

Woman's Party Dedicates New Building

All traffic on the eastern side of the Capitol was halted while the National Woman's Party dedicated its new building to the service of women. Women of all ages, dressed in white and carrying the yellow, white and purple banner, the colors of the Woman's Party, filled the streets, and the audience stretched away under the shade of the trees in the Capitol grounds. The entire block of three houses comprising the "Old Capitol" with its historical surrounding garden immediately opposite the present Capitol, were the gift of Mrs. O. P. Belmont to the Woman's Party. The "Old Capitol" was the building in which Congress held its sessions from 1815 to 1819, and was here that President Monroe was inaugurated in 1817.

Germany Renews Relations With United States

The new German Ambassador, Dr. Otto Wiedfeldt, was presented to the President by the Secretary of State this week. The Ambassador made an appeal for the personal confidence of President Harding and the resumption of those "intimate intellectual and moral economic relations" existing between the countries before the war.

Germany has officially returned to the seat of the American government after five years absence. The literal translation of the new Ambassador's credentials introduced him as representative of the "German Empire and German Republic." President Harding obviously regards the "German Empire" as dead, for in his response he confined himself to mention of the "German Republic."

House Votes on Filled Milk Bill

A bill prohibiting the shipment of filled milk in interstate commerce, long urged by farming and dairying interests, was by a vote of 256 to 40, passed by the House and sent to the Senate.

In reporting the measure, the Committee on Agriculture held that filled milk was "an imitation of condensed milk made by mixing condensed skimmed milk and cocoanut oil."

An amendment to the section defining "filled milk" offered by Representative Towner of Iowa, and adopted by the House, declared that the product is an adulterated and deleterious article of food which, when its composition is not indicated, constitutes a fraud upon the public.

Efficiency League of New South Wales, Australia, to Launch Prohibition Campaign

Some time ago the Business Men's Efficiency League of New South Wales, Australia, sent questionnaires to officials, commercial organizations and prominent business men throughout the United States and Canada relative to the effects of prohibition on trade. "You will be interested to know that we have received to date 300 replies," writes F. C. Middleton, Sydney, in a recent letter to Frank Ira White, manager of the foreign trade department of the Portland (Ore.) Chamber of Commerce, as quoted in the Portland Telegram of May 4. "Our correspondents include state governors, presidents of chambers of commerce, bank managers, railway presidents, big business concerns, social workers, etc. No less than thirty-six out of forty-eight states of the Union are represented, and seven out of the nine provinces of Canada. Replies include statements varying in length from three lines from John Wanamaker, merchant of Philadelphia, to a typewritten booklet of ten pages from the Mercantile Trust company of San Francisco.

"Of those replying, twenty-six give non-committal answers, forty-five give their judgment that the law is a failure, while 224 say with varying degrees of emphasis that prohibition is proving a decided benefit to the community generally, and to business in particular.

"A summary of the evidence we have received has been submitted to our members, and as a result of a ballot on the question our organization has decided to become a permanent educational agency among Australian business men in the interests of prohibition."

Prohibition a Matter of Training

"The fathers of today should train their sons in the belief that it is quite as much a crime to sell liquor or to drink as it is to steal; that they are both in the same sense violations of the law," says Kenneth J. Kindley of the Harvard Law School, according to the Philadelphia Enquirer of May 7. "I believe that in the next ten or fifteen years people will see the folly of drinking and that prohibition will then become a reality.

"If the newspapers, which are the greatest power in the country, would turn their attention to it and print the name of every man in any liquor raid, regardless of who he might be, the liquor question would be settled shortly. It is impossible to put every man who violates the law in jail. There wouldn't be enough jails in the country to hold them and the country would go bankrupt trying to take care of them. Heavy fines are the only solution."

Brazilian Ambassador Extols Prohibition

In an address to the Pan-American Conference of Women, Ambassador Mathieu of Brazil spoke the following emphatic words regarding the benefits of prohibition:

"Here in the United States everything seems to revolve about you women and your influence is so great that I am convinced, for instance, that the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States would never have become a reality had it not been for the far-reaching influence on public opinion exercised by women's organizations. Speaking of this amendment, one hears today many protests, but future generations will owe you a debt of gratitude for having liberated them from a vice which was undermining the stamina of the race, and for having removed a blot on our civilization."

A Real Blessing Says Senator Ashurst, of Prohibition

Recently Senator Ashurst of Arizona was asked by the Manufacturers' and Dealers' League of the city and state of New York to give his support to an amendment to the Volstead Act proposing to legalize the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. His reply follows:

"Yours of the twenty-third at hand suggesting an amendment to the Volstead Act legalizing the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer and you solicit my support of the proposal.

"It is my duty to tell you frankly that I cannot support such proposed legislation. Prohibition has proved to be a blessing to our country. Alcoholic liquor as a beverage adds neither strength, grace, nor charm to our national life.

"The smoldering fires of crime blaze into roaring flames when fed by alcohol. The volcano of secret sin and vice, when alcohol is poured into it, erupts the hot lava of ruin and woe."

Banks Co-operate in Law Enforcement

"Banking institutions will hereafter co-operate with the Federal government in enforcing the Volstead Act by immediately foreclosing mortgages held on property used in violation of the dry law, according to United States District Attorney John T. Williams, who has assurance of banking counsel that such action may be taken," says the San Francisco Examiner, in its issue of May 9.

"Williams further promises that hereafter when abatement proceedings are brought against a place he will see to it that the place is actually closed and sealed for one year, as provided by law, unless the owner of the property shows disposition to co-operate with prohibition and federal officials by evicting undesirable tenants and keeping them out.

"When landlords display a willingness and intention of keeping within the law themselves, there will be no serious objection to filing of the bond as provided by the prohibition enforcement act, staying the abatement order for one year."

Cuban Officials Co-operate to Suppress Smuggling of Liquor

Agent Spillard, back from Havana, Cuba, reported to Col. L. G. Nutt, who recently made a survey of Cuban smuggling conditions, that officials of the Cuban government are volunteering co-operation of the most effective character.

In one instance nine men were arrested and a large quantity of White Horse whisky seized by Chief Mario Martinez Lufrin, brother of the Secretary of the Interior, in a raid on a Cuban launch engaged in illicit exportation of liquor to the United States.

Another instance was the detention at Havana of an alleged American auxiliary schooner, "Yankton," suspected of running to the United States. The schooner had on board 437 cases of whisky and 525 cases of gin. The detention was upon the order of the Collector of Customs.

Still another instance of co-operation by the Cuban government was a decree of the Department of the Treasury that hereafter drawing off of alcohol from stills must be carried on in the presence of government inspectors, to "prevent alcohol ostensibly distilled for industrial purposes reaching the market as a beverage." In other words, to stop exportation of Cuban alcohol for purposes of rectification.

"The action of the Cuban officials," said Col. Nutt, "is most gratifying and points the way, through co-operation, to a successful solution of the smuggling problem."

Wet Propaganda Refuted

Dr. Stephen Smith, founder of the American Public Health Association, celebrated his ninety-ninth birthday in February. According to The American Issue, the New York Evening World, "one of the wettest of wet papers," published Dr. Smith's picture with a feature story in which it was suggested that he credits his long life to the drinking of wine.

This story went the rounds of the press, much to the disgust of the doctor, who finally furnished The American Issue with a signed statement in which he declared in part: "In denial of the items printed in some of the newspapers recently, let me say that I never said that I attribute my long life to the use of wines and liquors..... I do not believe that alcoholic stimulants should be used except as a medicine and then prescribed by a physician. I shall be glad if you will contradict these statements as printed as you have opportunity, and shall appreciate your co-operation."

Regional Law Enforcement Conventions Planned—Speakers of National Fame on Program at First Meeting

The first of a series of six regional law enforcement conferences, under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League, was held last week in Milwaukee. It was participated in by Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Ohio, Kentucky, Michigan, Indiana and Wisconsin. The conference was preceded by a Wisconsin State Law Enforcement convention, all the temperance organizations uniting. The meeting on Tuesday afternoon was in charge of the Milwaukee county W. C. T. U. and was followed by an informal reception to Miss Anna Adams Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U., who was one of the speakers at the evening meeting. Among other prominent people on the program were Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, Congressmen Barkley, Cooper and Nelson, Dr. P. A. Baker, Dr. Ernest H. Cherrington and Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler.

Five more regional law enforcement conferences are to be held at the following places and dates:

Atlanta, Ga., June 18-19-20. States—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee.

Oklahoma City, Okla., June 25-26-27. States—Oklahoma, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas.

Denver, Colo., June 29-30, July 2. States—New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada.

Boston, Mass., August 27-28-29. States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut.

Newark, New Jersey, October 8-9-10. States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia.

POLITICS AND PUBLIC CHARITIES

Deborah Knox Livingston, National Director

During the past fifty years there have been organized in this country many agencies dealing with all forms of public charity. The city and state governments have become responsible for the care in public institutions of the delinquent and dependent classes, and in this way the question of public charity has become closely related to politics.

In every community there are dependent children, orphaned or worse, whose parents are not competent to care for them, and old people no longer able to provide for themselves. Then there are the sick, the blind, the deaf and dumb, and the crippled, incapacitated for earning their living. To these must be added the feeble-minded and insane, and the large number of people, who, through intemperance, are unable to support themselves, or contribute to the maintenance of the family.

The old method of dealing with the dependent classes was to offer some form of relief, but, as it was only temporary, it did not give satisfaction. The modern method is to get at the sources which cause poverty and try to cure conditions, rather than relieve them.

The two main agencies for dealing with the dependent classes are the private organization and city and state government. In many instances, the private organization is the more effective, as the trustees and directors serve voluntarily, because of their love for humanity; but with our great population, and the ever-increasing throngs in our large cities, only a small proportion of the needy can be cared for by the private organization. Therefore, it becomes the duty of the state to provide for the poor, weak and sick, who are not cared for by their families, or by private charity.

If the problem of dependency in a community is really to be solved, there must exist between the private organizations and the state and city departments of charity the closest co-operation; otherwise, there is duplication of effort, and waste.

The societies for organized charity have made many investigations as to the cause of poverty and, as a result of these investigations, have arrived at several definite conclusions.

First, the lack of education is a great cause of dependency. Those who have not availed themselves of, or been able to attain an education that fits them for skilled work are always likely to become dependent, since in periods of industrial and financial depression they are always the first to be laid off and the last to be again employed. Their wages are never sufficient to permit them to save against the time when they are out of work. It is much wiser, and cheaper, that the state provide adequate trade education, through manual and trade schools, thus fitting boys and girls to become self-supporting, skilled workers, than to increase the dependent classes because of inadequate provision for trade education.

Second, the lack of health is one of the great contributory causes of poverty, and both the state and national governments are appropriating, and spending, large sums of money to lessen disease and the consequent dependency which follows. Most of the hospitals are built by the state, although in all states there are many hospitals built by private donation. State hospitals have too frequently become the spoil of unscrupulous politicians, and some of the worst political scandals which this country has ever known have centered about the very institutions which should have received most careful consideration and wisest administration. As, more and more, women are appointed to serve on the boards that govern these institutions, they will have a chance to rectify the conditions which have so long existed in many instances—a disgrace to our civilization. The state has learned that its greatest asset is the health of its people, and that public health cannot be bought and sold as a political or partisan commodity.

If the state can reduce to a minimum the causes of disease, and provide an education that will insure the child adequate means of support, the principal causes of dependency will be removed, and the rearing of a generation that will not need to appeal for public charity, made possible.

STATES HAVING TEMPERANCE DAY IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Tennessee	North Dakota
Kansas	Missouri
New Mexico	South Dakota
Kentucky	South Carolina
Wisconsin	Nevada
Pennsylvania	Nebraska
Maine	Ohio
Mississippi	North Carolina
	Minnesota

During the last twenty-five years, a great deal of protective legislation has been passed, which has greatly helped in the effort to eliminate public dependency. The laws known as the employers' liability laws, or the workmen's compensation acts, are recognized as foremost in this kind of protective legislation. Under the provision of the state laws, if a workman is injured, he (or his family) receives enough income, while he is recovering from his injury, to make it unnecessary for him to appeal for charity. In many states so valuable have these laws proved, that the national government has adopted them for its employees. In a great many states, there has been passed what is known as the minimum wage law, which fixes the scale for certain occupations, the idea being to insure for every worker a living wage.

In many states, there have been passed in recent years mothers' pension laws. In the old days, when a mother was left with dependent children, about the only thing she could do was to break up her home and place her children in an orphanage, or some other public institution. The purpose of the mothers pension law is to make this unnecessary the state to provide an allowance, based usually on the age and number of the children. This financial grant enables the mother to keep her home, and thus the children are not deprived of the care of home and mother. The women of all organizations should see to it that a mothers' pension law exists in every state.

Health insurance, which is very common in many European countries, and is beginning to be agitated in America is another method for the decreasing of dependents. Health insurance bills have been introduced in a number of state legislatures.

In recent years, many of our cities and states have established free employment bureaus, and in many of these a very definite effort has been made to "fit the job to the man and the man to the job."

These are a few of the ways in which we are seeking to solve some of the great social problems, by the enactment of legislation. We must remember, however, that to secure laws of this kind is not enough; competent men and women must be elected to the positions created by the provisions of such legislation and they should carry out the will of the people who have demanded the legislation. Every woman voter should take a very vital interest in the public charities of the city and state of which she is a citizen. Some of the questions she should ask and be able to answer are these:

Does my state make adequate provision for its dependents?

Are the appropriations for such provision wisely administered?

Are the men and women in whose care these dependents are placed, honest and efficient?

What part does party politics play in the appointment of such officials?

We, as good citizens, must aim to have our community as free from the dependent classes as possible, by giving to our future citizens the best possible education that they may become self-supporting, and by removing every cause that makes for disease and hinders the development of the public health.

Loud Talking by Anti-Prohibitionists Not Popular

[The following incident, recounted in the clip-sheet issued by the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Church, is of interest as showing the real sentiment in regard to prohibition.]

The writer was in a jury room recently when a new juror entered. In a few moments the man began to denounce the prohibition law and loudly herald his opposition to it. The other jurors sat around and smoked, giving an occasional laugh.

When the jury filed into the court to be examined for the trial of a liquor case, this man spoke up immediately, stating his opposition to the prohibition law and saying he would find it hard to convict any man for violation of He was excused.

We will always regret that that m could not hear the comments of t other jurors when they were alc again.

"He certainly did make a fool of hi self," said one.

"I'd stand by my country's law whetl I liked it or not," said another.

"Guess he thought it was smart," marked a third.

"There is one thing—he won't do business any good talking that way public," another said. "If he does like the law he should go and try get it changed."

Experience with that jury indicates us that about 24 out of 26 men tal from every class of life are for dras enforcement of the prohibition law. d this irrespective of their own opin as to prohibition.

JAIL TRANSFORMED THROUGH PROHIBITION

The building here pictured shows one of the concrete results of prohibition which cannot be refuted. It is situated in the city of Birmingham, Alabama, and was erected during the era of the open saloon as a jail, at an approximate cost of $100,000. In it could be accommodated an average of one hundred and fifty prisoners at one time. For only a few years, however, was it used for this purpose, for after the coming of state prohibition, the number of prisoners was so reduced that the jail was closed, and for several years used only as a storage house. Finally it was turned over to the Juvenile Court, and now does service as a Receiving Home and Parental School. Judge S. D. Murphy of Jefferson county, Alabama, in a letter to Mr. Gifford Gordon, Australian representative of the Sons of Temperance, tells the story of the transformation, and adds:

"There is no sentiment whatever in this city and state for the return of the saloon, and no one would be elected to any office on such a platform. That this is true is illustrated by the fact, that at a recent meeting of our state legislature, a bill was introduced authorizing the sale of a malt beverage similar in taste and looks to beer, but without alcohol. This was defeated, because of the fear that it would be an 'entering wedge' to other legislation favoring the sale of beer."

Prohibition Enforcement Naturally Difficult, Says Dr. Carver

During the war the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace brought out a series of monographs under the general title of "Preliminary Economic Studies of the War." One of the series written by Dr. Thomas Nixon Carver, professor of Political Economy at Harvard University, dealt with "Government Control of the Liquor Business in Great Britain and the United States." In the course of the discussion of prohibition, Dr. Carver with his usual lucid terseness took up the argument that prohibition is difficult to enforce, which is so frequently made with the implication that, therefore, the law should be repealed or weakened. Dr. Carver's reply is so pertinent to this present question that the following paragraphs are reproduced here:

"To argue that prohibitory laws can not be absolutely enforced is to show a complete inability to grasp the fundamentals of the problem. If a prohibitory law were not very difficult to enforce there would not be the slightest reason for having a prohibitory law. If it were not difficult to enforce a law against drink, it would argue that there was no very strong desire to drink liquor. If there were no very strong desire to drink liquor, it would not be worth while having a law to prevent drinking, however harmful it might be to those who saw fit to drink.

"For example, it is without doubt as harmful to take laughing gas in excess as alcohol in excess. The same may be said of many other substances. But if no one cares to take it to excess, it would be rather silly to have a law to prohibit it. At the same time, if such a law were enacted, it would be easily enforced because no one would have any motive for breaking it.

"Another illustration at the opposite extreme, is found in the case of prostitution. Here there is a powerful motive leading people to break the law. That is what makes the law so difficult to enforce. But, at the same time, that powerful motive makes it absolutely essential that there should be something to counteract it and hold it in control, otherwise it would drive men to harmful excess.

"Wherever you have two conditions, which will be named shortly, you will have: first, the necessity for legal control; second, great difficulty in effecting that control. In the case of prostitution we have both these conditions. In the case of laughing gas we have only one. Name any case whatsoever in which only one of these conditions exists, and you have named a case which calls for no legal control or repression. If only the second condition exists, legal control is easy but unnecessary. Name any case whatsoever in which both these conditions exist and you have named a case which calls for legal control and repression, and in which that legal control and repression will be very difficult to enforce. In fact, complete enforcement will be absolutely impossible.

"The only question, therefore, is, Does the drinking of alcohol form a case in which both conditions exist, or is it a case in which only one exists? That is to say, is it a case in which there is a powerful and widespread desire which leads to excess, and is that excess harmful, or is it a case in which there is no such powerful and widespread desire, or, if it exists, is it harmless? If it is a case of the former class, the powerful and widespread desire will lead large numbers to drink to excess, and the results of that excess will do great social harm. If it is a case where there is no particular desire that leads any considerable number to excess, even though such excess were theoretically harmful, there would be no great harm done by leaving men to themselves; or if there were a powerful and widespread desire leading to excess, but such excesses did no particular harm, again there would be no particular reason for legal control or repression.

"It will scarcely be denied by any reasonable person that the drink question comes under the first class of cases. It unquestionably forms a case where there is a powerful and widespread desire which leads large numbers to excess, and the results of that excess are exceedingly harmful. If there is anyone who doubts either of these statements, he is welcome to his views. Ink is too precious to waste upon him."

Let us confess that the Eighteenth Amendment leads the way for all nations of the earth in moral achievement; that America is the pathfinder for the race, in this legislation, but let us remember also that the majority have spoken and that American backbone is as strong today as it was when the world laughed at the experiment of independence, or scorned the prophecy of Lincoln, or doubted the dream of Roosevelt of the Panama Canal.

ROY A. HAYNES,
Federal Prohibition Commissioner.

Chicago Clergyman Attributes Improved Vice Situation in Part to Prohibition

Rev. Dr. John Thompson, a Chicago clergyman who has long made a special study of local social conditions, recently declared that he had for twenty-five years been conversant with the seamy side of life in Chicago, and that under prohibition and the cessation of segregation the vice situation in the metropolis had greatly improved.

Special Responsibility for Law Enforcement Rests upon Christian Women

Mrs. Wilbur Thirkield, President Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church

Every great organization should be outspoken today in defense of the laws written into our National Constitution. Especially should Christian women, as makers of homes and trainers of youth, use every effort to see that rightful duty to the Nation and the Government is revealed in obedience to, and enforcement of its laws. There must be honesty, in word and deed, within the home, if we would have like character in public life.

The power of suffrage came into the hands of women as the power of prohibition came into the life of the Nation, so that a great responsibility for the wise use of this privilege rests upon them. A noted writer said recently, after a careful study of prohibition and the Eighteenth Amendment: "The view at which I have arrived is that the basis of authority behind this action is not chiefly politics, not even Protestantism as vocal in the Churches, but—in a word—the women." Prohibition is a fact, and while women have realized its need and worked steadily, strongly in its behalf, today it is no longer a gospel but a law and the same unity of effort must be given to its enforcement.

Prohibition Affects Mission Centers

As a representative of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, enrolling a membership of over 400,000, touching closely millions of homes, I pledge their loyal support. Already its Mission Centers are feeling the change that has come from the closed saloon, and are adapting their lines of work to attract and hold the man of the street. The staff of workers is on guard continually to protect and help the city. Moralizing over the needs of the poor has been turned into building up their morale and a spirit of comradeship and cheer has been effected. Prohibition has opened the way for increasing usefulness and power. Every such organized group of women should be quick to meet this present need and opportunity by new plans and enlarged activities, doing its utmost to offset the alarming spread of lawlessness. While a subtle propaganda is abroad to destroy the force of this special Amendment, it is also undermining the whole principle of obedience to law and a strong word of warning has come from New York lawyers: "Our so-called reputable and responsible citizens must not wink at the violations of some laws and thus lead to disrespect for all laws."

Woman's Influence for Law Enforcement Untold

As individuals, women should be alert and intelligent on this question, speaking freely and plainly concerning its needs to the child in the home and the school, to the friend in a social group, to the voter and law-maker in Congress. Enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment must be practiced in private if it is demanded in public. Every wife and mother and daughter has here an untold influence. In Parent-Teacher Associations, Woman's Clubs, Interdenominational bodies, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and similar organizations, woman's voice should be heard by spoken and printed word as a unit for law and order.

Whole Question of Prohibition One of Principle

Alice Hegan Rice

What can the womanhood of this country do towards advancing the cause of temperance? Every woman, whether she be an advocate of prohibition or not, if she believes in the observance of the law should throw her influence in that direction. She should not only refrain from serving liquor in her own home, but should consistently refuse to take it in the homes of others.

The Volstead Act was passed by a vote of 176 to 55 in the House, and 65 to 20 in the Senate. Those women who honestly oppose prohibition, would be more consistent if they devoted their energies to trying to change the law instead of breaking it, and causing others to break it.

It is the duty of every intelligent woman to inform herself concerning the effects of prohibition. No radical change has ever been effected without confusion and we are now passing through the most critical time of re-adjustment. When "Thou shalt not steal" became a law it probably brought in its train a great many law-breakers, but civilization has rested largely upon the observance of that particular prohibition.

The hue and cry of personal liberty, of individual rights, was probably first raised when the first man was punished for killing his fellowman. If the "shall nots," which constitute our law, were removed today, we would promptly revert to barbarism.

Law Breaker an Enemy to the Constitution

The immediate results of prohibition, however, should concern us less than the ultimate results. The whole question is one of principle and should resolve itself into this primary consideration:

"Is the use of intoxicating liquor beneficial or harmful to the human race?"

This question has been put to industrial leaders, to welfare workers, to educators, to physicians, and the consensus of the most enlightened opinion of the world ought to convince the most skeptical.

The two great issues are the moral and the legal ones. Concerning the former there may be an honest difference of opinion; concerning the latter there is but one conclusion. As a Republic we have solemnly agreed to abide by the will of the people. The will of the people decreed that prohibition should become a law. Any man or woman who wilfully breaks the law, or encourages others to break the law, is an avowed enemy to the Constitution of the United States of America.

PROMINENT BANKERS TESTIFY THAT NATIONAL PROHIBITION HAS PROMOTED THRIFT AND ECONOMIC PROSPERITY

Answers received to a questionnaire sent out by THE UNION SIGNAL indicate not only a substantial increase in savings under prohibition but a unanimity of opinion among bankers that the 18th Amendment has been a big factor in promoting thrift.

ILLINOIS TRUST AND SAVINGS BANK, CHAMPAIGN, ILLINOIS

There has been an increase in the number and amount of savings depositors and deposits during the period national prohibition has been in operation. In my judgment, prohibition has promoted thrift among the people to a great extent. Many poor people are buying homes now who could not have bought them before. From the standpoint of the banker and business man, prohibition I believe has been of great economic value to the community. We do not think it possible to tell you all the good it has done.

GEORGE R. SHAWHAN,
Manager Savings Department.

FARMERS AND MECHANICS SAVINGS BANK, MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA

There can be no question in our minds but that prohibition has promoted thrift among the wage earners and small salaried persons and, we believe, from that standpoint, it has been of great economic value. The people are better housed, better clothed and better educated on account of the money they now have to devote to such purposes, and which formerly went for strong liquors.

THOMAS F. WALLACE,
Treasurer.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF JOLIET, JOLIET, ILLINOIS

There has been an increase in the number of savings depositors in our bank since national prohibition went into operation, and the amount of deposits has increased. In our opinion national prohibition has tended to promote the thrift movement.

GEORGE WOODRUFF, President.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, MADISON, WISCONSIN

In my humble judgment, prohibition has promoted thrift among the people. Because of the traffic in liquor that we have in our "little Italy" section of the city, there is no doubt about the fact that prohibition has been of considerable economic value to that section. Seriously, however, I believe it is of very great economic and social value to the community and to the nation.

W. E. WALKER,
Director New Business Department

THE OLD SECOND NATIONAL BANK, AURORA, ILLINOIS

There has been some increase in the number of depositors since national prohibition went into operation, and also an increase in the amount of deposits.

I will say that I am inclined to think that national prohibition in a city like Aurora, which is a manufacturing community, has tended to promote some thrift. I am also inclined to believe that the benefit from prohibition has largely come to the man who weekly spent a considerable part of his wages in the saloon. That sort of man has taken his money home, and has spent it with his family for picture shows, new clothes, oftentimes many things that were far from thrifty. I know of many instances where men and their families have spent money unwisely for things unnecessary, but, in the final analysis, I am inclined to believe that the expenditures they make today are better for the man and his family than the old method of spending money in the saloon. I think the saloon is gone forever.

WILLIAM GEORGE,
President.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Immediately after prohibition became the law of the land a large influx of savings accounts was noticeable in our bank and, I believe, generally in other banks.

The unemployment which has prevailed during the past year has resulted in an abnormal number of withdrawals and has checked the growth of the aggregate amount of savings deposits.

The number of accounts opened has, however, steadily increased, showing that the number of the thrifty is steadily growing and I believe that the absence of the saloon is largely responsible for this growth. Another indication of the increasing number of thrifty people in the community is the greatly increased number of investors in bonds of the smaller denominations.

There can be no doubt that prohibition is a promoter of both thrift and industry.

JAMES B. FORGAN,
President.

ST. PAUL TRUST AND SAVINGS BANK, ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA

Our Bank Department has been open only the past year, or since prohibition went into effect. We believe, however, that we have received a greater number of accounts and greater volume of deposits under prohibition than we would have otherwise.

T. H. RICHARDSON,
Manager Mortgage Department.

MERCHANTS AND SAVINGS BANK, JANESVILLE, WISCONSIN

During the past two years we have been in rather a peculiar position. We have passed through a crisis such as was never experienced before, owing to the reaction from the late war. I am sorry to say that during the past two years we have had no increase in deposits, but I do not wish you to think that this would have been any different if there had been no prohibition. I think on the whole prohibition has really helped us to hold our own.

I think prohibition has promoted thrift among the people. There can be no argument on this question. I will say, also, from the standpoint of a banker that prohibition is certainly a real economic value to any community.

WILLIAM BLADON,
President.

THE PEOPLE'S TRUST AND SAVINGS BANK, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

I have no figures with which to back the statement, but I fully believe that prohibition has materially benefited and promoted thrift among the people of this country, and, consequently, has been of considerable value to the community.

EARL H. REYNOLDS,
President.

FIRST FOND DU LAC NATIONAL BANK, FOND DU LAC, WISCONSIN

My personal opinion, which is corroborated by the manager of our savings department, is that national prohibition has contributed to the thrift among the people at large, and if business were normal, we would show some considerable increase in our savings deposits, which might be directly attributed to national prohibition.

ERNEST J. PERRY,
President.

MIDLAND TRUST AND SAVINGS BANK, ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA

My own personal observation would lead me to believe that the economic value of prohibition in the community would be greatly increased providing the laws were in such shape that the moonshiners could be properly prosecuted, and not merely let off with a nominal fine. They are the worst class of criminals and should be put behind the bars where they belong.

E. M. MORTENSEN,
Secretary.

NEW BEDFORD INSTITUTION OF SAVINGS, NEW BEDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS

Without having reliable figures upon which to base a statement, my opinion is that prohibition has promoted thrift among the working people in New Bedford. There has been a great deal of home building, for one thing, and our charity workers all speak of better conditions in the homes of the people where they happen to be called, little distress and poverty due to intemperance on the part of bread-winners.

THOMAS S. HATHAWAY,
President.

BROADWAY SAVINGS BANK, LAWRENCE, MASSACHUSETTS

As I understand it, the war measure went into effect July, 1919, and the Volstead Act, January 16, 1920. This period has been the most successful period in the history of our bank and also of our city. A part of this period was the most successful in the country's history, but just how much you can credit to prohibition is a debatable question. Personally, I believe that prohibition has had some effect on our prosperity.

C. O. ANDREWS,
Treasurer.

OSHKOSH SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY, OSHKOSH, WISCONSIN

We are primarily an investment and trust company, our savings department being a subordinate activity. Our general observation, however, is that prohibition has been effective in promoting thrift, and that the general economic condition of a considerable portion of the wage earning population has been improved thereby.

R. P. BOARDMAN,
Secretary.

LOWELL INSTITUTION FOR SAVINGS, LOWELL, MASSACHUSETTS

Our deposits have increased normally for the past two years. In our judgment, thrift has not been much affected by prohibition, but, while a great deal of lawlessness in the illegal traffic of liquor is now very much on the front page of our newspapers, we believe that the low moral mark has been reached, and within a few years the benefits of prohibition will be manifested.

EDWARD B. CARNEY,
Treasurer.

High Praise From Enforcement Official

The Federal Prohibition director for the state of Washington, Mr. Roy C. Lisle, says of the Law Enforcement Manual, issued by the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, compiled by our national president, that it is the finest, clearest, best presentation of the subject he has ever seen. He remarked that he always carries a copy in his pocket and keeps a supply on hand to give away.

Mrs. Livingston in South Africa

News has been received of the safe arrival in Capetown, South Africa, of Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, national W. C. T. U. director of Christian Citizenship, who at the invitation of the W. C. T. U. of that country is speaking in the local option campaign. Mrs. Livingston is receiving a most cordial welcome not only from her comrades of the W. C. T. U. and the members of other temperance organizations but from the public generally. She was tendered a reception at Cathedral Hall, Capetown, at which representatives of the leading organizations of the city were in the receiving line. Later, at the request of the University students, she spoke to them on "How Prohibition Came to America."

RESOLUTION

Suggested for Adoption by Churches and Other Influential Organizations, and by Public Meetings Generally.

W. C. T. U. speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

Campaign Mathematics

Generally speaking, statistical arguments are the most difficult to handle, and the least likely to impress the popular mind. There are, however, notable exceptions. A recent example is a sticker issued by the Legislative Department of the Congress of Mothers and the Parent-Teacher Association. It tells the percentage of charity cases in wet 1917, and dry 1921, in which drink was a factor in five of the big cities, as shown by statistics of charity organizations, as follows:

	1917	1921
New York Charity Organization	23%	8
Boston Family Welfare Society	27%	2 (7 mos.)
St. Louis Provident Association	11%	0.7
Cleveland Associated Charities	17%	2
Chicago United Charities	8%	1

The average is 17 1-5 per cent cases in wet 1917 over against 2 7-10 per cent cases in dry 1921—an argument for prohibition its opponents will find it difficult to answer.

Be It Resolved

Resolutions are poor substitutes for action, but they are useful as an expression of opinion and desire. Every influential body, in convention assembled, should go on record publicly on the prohibition question, with a strong "Be it Resolved" similar to that just passed by the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church, declaring against the repeal or weakening of the Volstead Law. On this page there is given a suggested form of memorial for adoption by public meetings. Bring it to the attention of those in charge of such gatherings in your city, and urge its passage.

Feed Them on Facts

A story is going the rounds that a prominent New York divine once invited Sam Small, the very original evangelist, to dine with himself and a learned theological professor. After a time the conversation lagged, and in order to stimulate it, the host asked the professor how he prepared his discourses for delivery to his students. Most impressive was the reply: "I endeavor to present a concatenation of concepts calculated to produce certain psychological reactions." Somewhat stunned by this erudite response, the host turned to Sam Small and asked his method with regard to his addresses. "Oh," said Mr. Small, in his usual informal fashion, "I just spread out the fodder so anything from a jellyfish to a giraffe can come and help himself." THE UNION SIGNAL does not pretend to give to its readers any abstruse "concatenation of concepts calculated to produce psychological reactions" but it does aim each week to spread out a page, at least, of good mental fodder in the shape of facts concerning the benefits derived from the national prohibition law. This is the kind of mental food we believe is very much needed at the present hour to stabilize public sentiment in favor of prohibition.

In former issues we have furnished a mass of evidence from governors, mayors of big cities, health officials, manufacturers, and college presidents. In this issue we give the testimony of leading bank officials. From week to week there will appear similar statements from chambers of commerce, state boards of charity, social welfare workers, labor representatives and individuals prominent along other lines.

We will supply the facts. You, gentle reader, are expected to feed them to a somewhat sceptical public inclined to believe that prohibition is not functioning, and is failing to produce any results worth while.

Give people a full feast of forcefu facts and they will soon lose their appetite for the false and foolish fairy tales concerning prohibition that are floating around.

From the Lips of Our Opponents

Often and often have battles of various kinds been won because one side or the other has studied the methods of the opponents and by fighting them with their own weapons, has gone forward to victory.

In these critical days of the last campaign for a truly dry America, it is not only of great interest, but also of value to note carefully the statements of those who are trying to nullify the prohibition laws. Their tactics may well be considered. For example, a San Francisco paper of recent date favorably comments upon the petition method of bringing important matters before the proper parties, and makes the suggestive statement that "there should be an organization of the community desire for amendment of the Volstead Act. The work should be taken up publicly and headed by representative men and women of some standing in the state. Semi-privately organized appeals, or even petitions signed indiscriminately at street corners can have little effect, but Congress will do the will of the nation if the nation speaks to it with an organized voice and does not leave organization on the subject to those extremists that are heedless of the moral consequences of widespread violations of the law."

The editor of the Dubuque (Iowa) Herald makes these statements: "The prohibitionists succeeded with Congress and the legislatures because they were organized and aggressive. They convinced the statesmen that they could and would command votes in opposition to any member declining or failing to support the prohibition amendment. When the politicians conclude that the opponents of prohibition are just as much in earnest they will wax eloquent in defense of personal liberty."

RESERVED SEATS FOR WORLD'S CONVENTION

As previously announced, the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. has engaged the Academy of Music in Philadelphia for the World's Convention.

This historic building has a seating capacity of about 3,600.

Seats for the regular delegates will be reserved (without charge) in the parquet.

In order that visitors may be assured of seats, reservations will be sold, beginning with the publication of this notice. All applications, accompanied by price of seat, will be recorded in the order in which they are received by the undersigned, and selection of seats made upon that basis.

On account of a state law which prohibits any sale of tickets for Sunday, reservations will not cover that day, but will include the afternoon and evening meetings on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, November 13, 14 and 15.

All morning meetings, as well as those on Saturday, November 11, will be held in the audience room of the Bellevue-Stratford hotel, for which no reservations are sold.

Receipts will be issued for all payments and a careful record kept of sales. To prevent possible loss, the reserved seat ticket will not be delivered until claimed in Philadelphia, on or after November 7.

Reservations may be transferred upon written order of the purchaser.

Boxes are of different sizes, seating from four to six persons.

Checks should be made payable to the undersigned.

Prices per each seat are as follows:

Parquet	$3.00
Parquet Circle	2.00
Balcony, first two rows	2.00
Balcony, second and third rows	1.50
Box seat, main floor and balcony	4.00

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

THIS I KNOW

"Whether there many be or few
Elect the heavenly goal to win,
Truly I know not:—this I know,
That none who march with footsteps slow,
That none who fight with hearts untrue,
That none who serve with service cold,
Th' Eternal City shall behold,
Or enter in.

"Whether there many be that thrive
In their vast suit for that vast love,
Truly I know not:—this I know,
That but to seek is not to strive:
That love lives not in empty show,
That thankless praises, heartless prayers,
Can claim no bond for will of theirs
His face to see."

Lady Astor Before Sailing Makes Statement Concerning Prohibition

Declaring that prohibition in the United States has been "a big contribution to the spiritual regeneration of the world," Lady Astor in a final interview, as she was sailing for home, gave out the following statement, as reported by the press:

"When I balance the result, offset the uplifting of the poor and struggling and the salvation which prohibition has brought to many wives and children against the alleged degradation of some of the rich, I have no doubt the net result to the country has been good. The general sentiment seems to be that it is the rich and not the poor who really get the worst of it."

Lady Astor said the only anti-American propaganda she had observed in England was engendered by the liquor interests, which have gone into politics over the drink question. She said prohibition had shown itself not only a problem of social welfare but of clean politics as well.

"I am constantly asked," said Lady Astor, "if on my return to England I am going to advocate the passing of a prohibition act. I am not. I shall support and urge the adoption of legislation giving localities the right of option in deciding by direct vote whether or not they want the drink traffic to continue and also the extent and method subject to which it is to be sold."

Lady Astor's point of view is essentially that of a mother and a lover of children. At a meeting in Chicago, in relating an incident which occurred when juvenile court legislation was before Parliament, she told of the long drawn-out opposition on the part of certain members of the British Parliament who argued against a court that would come down to the needs of a child, as tending to lower the dignity of the judges. Along about two or three in the morning, it came Lady Astor's turn to deliver her soul, and as she naively remarked, she told these men that they would better remember their women constitutents for when it came to consideration of the soul of a child, no true woman cared a twopence for the dignity of anybody or anything.

"The greatest thing women can do for posterity," she has said, "is to give to the children the right kind of education, to teach them to love God..... Let the men see that we desire a better, safer and cleaner world for our children and their children. By doing our bit, by facing unclean things with cleanliness, by facing wrong with right, by going fearlessly into all things that may be disagreeable, we will somehow make a better world."

The Brewers' Year Book

"That literary gem, the 'Year Book of the United States Brewers' Association,' which cheers but not inebriates, is again upon our desk. We feared for a while it was lost to us, for the literary market has been off for the 'Year Book' recently, but here it is back again, a little reminiscent in mood, but still hopeful and inspiring."

So states the Kansas City Star, in a delightful review of the brewers' "Year Book." We quote a few paragraphs as follows:

"We always liked the 'Year Book.' Its literary taste is excellent. It can always be counted on to lead off with a quotation from Emerson or John Stuart Mill or De Tocqueville. It does not quote Mill's well-known remark, 'I always take my glass of half-and-half before going to bed.' That would be too obvious, too much like talking shop, and the 'Year Book' abhors commercialism. It prefers Mill in his loftier and more philosophical moments, as when he said, 'There is a circle around every human being which no government ought to be permitted to overstep.' The 'Year Book' does our intelligence the compliment to assume that we will recognize that when Mill wrote that he was referring to the Volstead law. And that quotation which the 'Year Book' gives us from De Montesquieu, 'I shall ever repeat it that mankind are governed not by extremes, but by principles of moderation.' The 'Year Book' does not coarsely point out that by moderation De Montesquieu meant 4 per cent beer and light wines. It knows we know that.

"After this literary repast the 'Year Book' does, it is true, devote a few words—about 150 pages—to a philosophical discussion of prohibition; call it business if you will, for after all a 'Year Book' must live. It says that now that prohibition is here it experiences a great relief, for now the slate is clean and the country can make a fresh start in the way of writing sane and reasonable regulatory laws for booze.

RED LETTER DAYS

June 9—Flower Mission Day (Birthday of Jennie Casseday)
July 4—National Independence Day (Birthday of Mary H. Hunt)

A Message to the Public School Teacher

Elizabeth Owens Middleton, World's Superintendent and National Director, Department of Scientific Temperance Instruction

June, first and most beautiful of the summer months, is here, and with it comes the welcome thought of relaxation and rest. To the tired teacher it means the closing of the school room and dismissal of pupils, perhaps a brief outing in God's open country and a full breath of pure air. We wish it might mean for her, tired and nerve worn from long months of strain, a full three months of such out of door life, with an easy chair on some shady porch, and nothing to do but rest. But idleness is not always rest. Rest is found in change of occupation.

"Rest is not quitting the busy career, Rest is the fitting of self to a sphere."

Your rest will be fitting yourself for future activity through summer schools and teachers' institutes. The national director anticipates pleasure in meeting several thousand teachers in the summer schools of Illinois, North Dakota, and several provinces of Canada. Her message to these teachers will include an appreciation of the work they have done in scientific temperance teaching, through which they have "helped change the thought of the nation" concerning the use of alcoholic beverages. It is conceded that it is the temperance teaching in the public schools which made possible the vote that gave this nation national constitutional prohibition. Former United States Commissioner of Education, Hon. P. P. Claxton, said: "In the creation of a sentiment which has resulted first in local option, then in state prohibition, and now in national prohibition, the schools of the country have played a very important part—in fact, probably a major part. A generation ago the Woman's Christian Temperance Union succeeded in having laws passed in most or all of the states requiring instruction in physiology and hygiene with special reference to the deleterious effects of alcohol, to be given in all public schools. This has resulted, first, in clearer thinking, and, second, in better and stronger sentiment in regard to the sale and use of alcoholic drinks."

The national director, in her message to teachers, will emphasize the present urgent need for the continued teaching of the nature of alcohol and its effect upon the human system. The need of renewed vigilance on the part of friends of prohibition is clearly shown by the wet activities in the present Congress.

Two joint resolutions amending the Constitution, both designed to legalize light wines and beer, and a bill providing in effect for submission of the same question to a referendum vote, have been introduced in the House by Representative Ansorge of New York. One resolution proposes the addition of a new section to the Eighteenth Amendment which would expressly provide that the words "intoxicating liquor" do not include 2.75 per cent beer. The other proposed amendment would permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer under government regulation and control, while another section would provide that a state legislature shall not vote on the question until the people of the state have passed on the members of that legislature at an election.

Representative Hill of Maryland has introduced a bill to permit the manufacture of 2.75 per cent beer and cider in any Congressional district by a referendum vote, both liquors to be subject to a tax of twenty cents a gallon.

These activities in Congress are a result of the effort made by the thirty-six organizations that have already been formed to fight prohibition by weakening the Volstead Code and breaking down the Eighteenth Amendment. At this critical time we urge careful attention to the teaching of the harmful effects of alcohol, as required in the temperance education law of each state.

The teacher recognizes another evil, the cigaret and its damaging effects upon the brain as well as the body of the growing child. In our outline for temperance teaching we also recognize this evil, and are bringing to your aid the best scientific and other reliable data as fast as we secure it.

Some of the helps this Department offers the teachers are as follows:

A new Course of Study for the grades. This gives an outline of temperance lessons to be correlated with the health lessons now used in the schools, and covering the teaching against alcohol, nicotine and other narcotics. This will soon be in print.

A set of five Graded Charts with explanatory Manual. Two of these charts are on tobacco, "How the Smoker's Heart Is Affected" (sphygmograph experiment), and "The Effects of Tobacco," from a college test; one on the brain, and two on the effects of alcohol.

A set of 12 anti-alcohol posters, "Why America Went Dry," with explanatory booklet, a lesson on each chart. These show the relative amount of alcohol in whisky, wine and beer, the danger in the use of even small amounts of alcohol as found in these drinks, and the detriment caused by them physically, mentally, and morally, thus lowering the standard of business efficiency and success in life.

Other charts and posters on alcoho and tobacco, including a Physical Deca log.

Story booklets, including "Temperanc Tales," "About Our Country," "Abou Ourselves," "Sidelights from Shake peare," and "It is Written," (Bible storie for boys and girls), with a primar booklet, "A Handful of Hints" for th teacher.

Nineteen states have a legal Tempe ance or Frances E. Willard Day to b observed in the schools. The Nationa W. C. T. U. issues annually a prograr embracing songs, drills, and interestin and instructive material to be used b the teacher in the observance of this da Many of the states use this national pr gram. In some of the states the stat board of education prints its own pr gram. adapted from the national pr gram, and mailed to the teachers fro the office of the state superintendent.

Upon invitation of the educational a thorities special lecturers are sent ou by this department for a series of le sons or lectures in teachers' college before summer schools, county teacher institutes, etc.

The essay and poster contest h proven a popular feature in interestin both teacher and pupils in this subjec and in creating temperance sentime in the community. Thousands of essa are written in the states every yea and greater activity than usual is r ported this year. The essay work is a progressive basis. The prize winnin essays in the local contests compete f county prizes, the essays winning cou ty prizes compete for state prizes, a the essays winning state prizes are e tered to compete for prizes offered by t National W. C. T. U. The thought the prize essay contest has spread India, Chile, Canada, China, and oth nations.

These essay contests embrace grades of the ward school, senior-juni and sophomore-freshman classes in t high school, teacher-training schools, c leges, and a prize of $50.00 has recen been added for the best essay by a public school teacher on the subj "Best Methods of Teaching Temperanc Valuable essays come to us in the teacher contests which we put into le let form for the benefit of other tea ers.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

He Protested and Then Said "Good Night"

The Brooklyn Riding and Driving Club of Philadelphia was not left in doubt as to why the Rev. James E. Crowther, pastor of the Arch Street Methodist Church, who had been invited to speak at the club's annual banquet, took his departure as soon as he saw the tables upon which were conspicuously displayed bottles of whisky. Dr. Crowther first protested and then—picked up his hat and said good night.

In reply to a note enclosing a check for his expenses from the treasurer of the club, Dr. Crowther, in returning it, wrote in part:

"If there is any part of the Constitution that is not in harmony with my judgment or desire there are means provided whereby it may be changed. But it is a dangerous thing to assume that the Constitution of the United States is subject only to the passions of men. The men of wealth of our club need not complain if the anarchists disregard the Constitution's provisions pertaining to property.

"I came to you in good faith, with a carefully prepared message on significant events in the present world of evil. I was especially encouraged by the assurance that ninety-five per cent of your clubmen were church men..... Under the circumstances which were disclosed at the banquet, it proved utterly inopportune to discuss any subject that would have been out of harmony with the feast of Belshazzar. Nor could I as a guest and gentleman make reference to the scene, although some had for the time being forgotten the standards which usually characterize gentlemen."

Manly Confession of Gifted Magazine Writer

It takes a big man to publicly confess that he has done wrong. Robert Quillen, a gifted and successful magazine writer, also the editor of the Fountain Inn (S. C.) Tribune, recently published in his paper the following remarkable confession:

"Of all the hard jobs in the world, that of making a public confession is the hardest. But it is the only square thing to do, it must be done. This, therefore, is an open letter to the young fellows of Fountain Inn—the 'good fellows,' the fellows I love and loaf with at times—the fellows I have taken drinks with and fellowshiped with.

"All this while I have been a member of the church—just that and nothing more. And when my conscience bothered me about taking a drink when I could get it, I said to myself: 'Why, I am a liberal supporter of the church; I pay the tithe; I am a gentleman and a man of intelligence; there's no harm in my taking a drink when I want it, for I can handle it.'

"I said that, but I was a liar. And while posing as a church member and a follower of Christ and yet reserving the right to take a drink at my pleasure, I was considerably lower down than a snake's belly.

"This is a bitter dose to swallow, fellows, but I had it coming to me. And if my conduct has led any of you to believe that a man can retain his honor while carrying water on both shoulders, I want to make it clear that it's an impossibility.

"I'm through. I'm thirty-four years of age, and have never struck a lick for my Lord. From now on I am His, to use as He thinks best, and I'll stick to Him if it costs me everything I have and every friend I have.

"I'm ashamed, fellows. Forgive me for not having been square."

SOME ONE SAYS IT CAN'T BE DONE

Some one says it can't be done.
Do it!
Every battle can be won.
To it!
Doubt, despair and hesitation
Spell the doom of all creation,
He who wins is he who weathers
Through it.

Some one wonders, waits and weeps.
Loses!
He who close to victory keeps
Chooses
Faith and work and never lingers,
Counting failure on his fingers,
But with courage every "Halt!"
Refuses.

Some one takes the darkest night
And lights it.
With a gleaming sword of hope
Smites it.
Changes doleful gloom to dawn,
And when every cloud is gone,
Looks to find another foe
And fights it.

Hamlin Garland on "Alcoholic Inspiration"

The lively altercation between Bernard Shaw and A. Quiller-Couch on the necessity of alcoholic beverages as a stimulus to literary achievements, has led to interviews as to their views on the subject with many prominent men of letters. A report of such an interview with Hamlin Garland by a representative of The New York Times is interesting reading. We quote from it:

"I don't drink or smoke or chew, I've never been in a saloon in my life, and don't propose to start now. Of course," he smiled, "men that enjoy these things may say that I'm not in their class, and to get in their class I'd have to cultivate their habits. Well, I'll have to leave it to the critics to decide between their work and Shaw's. When any of these gentlemen climb up into Bernard Shaw's class, it will be on another kind of ladder than a row of beer and champagne bottles. They may get there—everything is possible. But it won't be with the help of alcohol.

"You know, this talk about drinking among the authors is a sort of tradition that comes down from Grub Street, a survival of the tales of the Mermaid Inn. There's very little in it.

"I can become as perfectly hilarious over a cracker and a small sup of coffee as I care to get. The kind of inspiration that comes out of a bottle doesn't appeal to me. I hate the whole lobster-palace, jazz-drugged atmosphere, and I think people are beginning to tire of it."

* * * * *

"This delusion that writers need to drink reminds me of a story that Thoreau used to tell. 'One day,' said Thoreau, 'as I was walking in the fields, I chanced upon a farmer at work on his soil. We fell to discussing vegetarianism. I was defending it. But the farmer could not see it. "No, sir," he said, "if a man has to work, he needs strength—and how can he get any strength unless he eats good meat?" And all the time we were talking,' Thoreau would conclude, 'the farmer was being dragged along by two powerful oxen who never ate anything but a little green grass.'

"If these men who talk so much about needing liquor only stop and consider, they will realize that real literary power does not need to be coaxed along with whisky."

"Women Will Win," Says Kathleen Norris, Author of Many "Best Sellers"

"But, Mother," the little girl asked fearfully, "what will kill your dragon?" Her mother smiled, and a quiet, confident look came into her eyes.

"American women will kill that dragon, God willing," she said gravely, "a greater force than any army ever was, anywhere—the women who have suffered shame and hurt and want and wrong for so many years. The women who have loved some poor victim of the dragon. And the women who have Marys and Tommies to guard from danger."

This reads like a fairy tale, you say. It is the closing paragraph of a fairy tale, a thrilling one, written by Kathleen Norris, the loved woman writer, and published in the San Francisco Examiner, May 14, 1922. The editors had asked her to give her views on the much debated prohibition situation from the standpoint of an American mother. She wrote the article in the form of a conversation between a mother and two of her children, seated around the family hearthstone at nightfall. Graphically she describes the Dragon who stalks about leaving misery and disease and poverty behind him, until the children guess that it is the Dragon Drink. She closes with the sentence with which we began, "American women will kill that dragon, God willing."

"It will pay the earnest and conscientious citizen of this country," says the Nebraska City (Nebraska) Press, "to be ever on his guard to prevent the recurrence of the days when the American saloon and its evil influences cast a shadow over every home." And as Capper's Weekly warns us: "What men and women voters who stand for law observance must watch this year will be the attempt to run dummy dry candidates against genuine drys in the Congressional elections, which will be attempted in order to split the prohibition vote and let the wet candidate win. We must spoil that plot."

White Ribboners Turn Out In Force For Institute

A large number of W. C. T. U. women, eager to learn of recent plans made by the organization, attended the Franklin county, (N. Y.) institute, which met recently at Malone, Mrs. M. C. Gehring, the country president, presiding. Because of the unenviable notoriety for booze running which, by reason of their proximity to the Canadian border, the northern counties of New York state have had thrust upon them, unusual interest centered in the gathering. A large force of efficient prohibition officials, Federal, state and county, are kept busy contending with this lawless traffic.

The leader of the institute, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, state president and National W. C. T. U. vice-president-at-large, gave the keynote of the meeting, explaining the membership campaign and the state plans for promoting it. Following the noontide prayer, she gave a wonderful Bible reading, full of uplift, and in the afternoon delivered an interesting address on law enforcement in which she outlined methods of securing it, and made clear Federal and state laws.

A half hour with the children, a demonstration by the state superintendent of Health and Heredity, an excellent paper by the state superintendent of Sabbath Observance, and another on the results of prohibition, were features of the program.

In the evening Mrs. Boole gave before an audience that filled the large auditorium of the M. E. church, a most timely and forceful address on "The Patriotism of Peace and War." All were strengthened in their resolution to engage with even greater earnestness in the struggle against the liquor traffic.

Prominent Bankers Testify That National Prohibition Has Promoted Thrift and Economic Prosperity

SOUTH CHICAGO SAVINGS BANK
SOUTH CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Replying to the question, "In your opinion has national prohibition generally promoted the thrift movement among your citizens," Mr. Warren W. Smith, president of the South Chicago Savings Bank, says, "It has."

STATE SAVINGS, LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY, QUINCY, ILLINOIS

Prohibition has probably promoted thrift. It is hard to answer the question as to whether prohibition has been of economic value in this community. It probably has been, though it is hard to determine.

S. B. MONTGOMERY,
President.

THE NORTHERN TRUST COMPANY,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

In answer to your question, whether in our opinion national prohibition has tended to promote the thrift movement, the general opinion seems to be, that under parallel business conditions national prohibition should promote thrift among wage earners and a certain class of salaried people.

RICHARD M. HANSON,
Assistant Cashier and Manager Savings Department.

CENTRAL NATIONAL BANK OF PEORIA,
PEORIA, ILLINOIS

In reply to the question, "Has national prohibition tended to promote the thrift movement?" we would say, such influence as has been exerted by the legislation we believe has undoubtedly been in the direction of the promotion of thriftiness among the citizens of our country.

FREDERICK F. BLOSSOM,
President.

Mr. Alex Highland, president Stock Yards National Bank, St. Paul, Minnesota, and Mr. V. J. Bullett, president Lincoln Savings Bank and Trust Company, of Louisville, Kentucky, and W. G. Johnston, cashier of the Rock Island Savings Bank of Rock Island, Illinois, replied with a definite "Yes," to all three questions asked, stating there had been an increase in the number and amount of deposits in their savings banks during the period of national prohibition; that in their judgment prohibition had promoted thrift, and that from the standpoint of bankers and business men, prohibition, they believed, had been of economic value to their respective communities.

Missouri Standing Firm for the Minimum Wage

Nelle G. Burger, President Missouri W. C. T. U.

For two years the Missouri W. C. T. U. has been educating its membership upon the necessity for a minimum wage for the over-worked and under-paid girl workers in Missouri. At the last legislature, a bill covering this need was introduced, but came to an untimely end on the rocks of adverse committees, so-called unconstitutionality and the hostility of "big business" interests who fought it from start to finish.

Out of the wreck we were enabled to secure the appointment of a Minimum Wage Commission, composed of three senators, three representatives, who were assigned by the legislature, and three women, the choice of the governor. The state president of the Missouri W. C. T. U. was made a member of this commission and later elected its secretary-treasurer.

This commission is to investigate working conditions and wages, and from the results prepare a bill to be introduced in the general assembly of 1923.

A campaign of education is now being carried on in the state. Hon. Jeannette Rankin has covered all of the larger cities and towns, voicing a telling message in behalf of the minimum wage. Miss Rankin possesses a happy faculty of entertaining, and instructing, and as she has a most charming personality, quickly made many friends for herself and the cause which she so ably espouses.

Miss Rankin was sent to Missouri by the National Consumers' League, of which she is field secretary, and to that organization we express our deep appreciation. The Missouri Minimum Wage Commission made the engagement, and the route was planned by the Missouri W. C. T. U. Miss Rankin spoke before a number of the seventeen regional conferences, just held in Missouri, in addition to a multitude of clubs and other organizations, also filling pulpits every Sunday. Her indefatigable efforts will surely bring results.

The Women's Bureau of Washington, D. C., is undertaking an industrial investigation which will prove of inestimable value in the campaign. Miss Mary Anderson and Miss Caroline Manning are making the survey which will cover St. Louis, Springfield, Carthage, Joplin, Kansas City, St. Joseph, Jefferson City, Sedalia, Moberly, Marshall, and Hannibal, where the major part of the manufactories are located.

The Missouri W. C. T. U. is making the minumum wage its particular educative legislative work just now and will continue to do so until this much needed law is passed.

"Law Enforcement" is our slogan, and our chief aim. We are giving active support to the law enforcement forces, local, state and Federal.

The election of dry candidates will keep the "political pot" boiling merrily until after the primary, August 1. Every wet candidate will be opposed and the strongest dry men supported, regardless of party affiliation. Each aspirant for office is being questioned and all facts will be placed in the hands of our women with an earnest appeal to do their duty and elect dry men to the state legislature and Congress.

Opposes Nomination of Senator Reed

The avowed purpose of the wets to send to the state legislature and to Congress only such men as will vote to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, means that we have a fight ahead both at the August primary and at the November election. Perhaps the most outstanding opponent to those things for which we stand, is Senator James A. Reed. After a majority vote of the state executive committee, a resolution was adopted to the effect that the Missouri Woman's Christian Temperance Union is opposed to Senator Reed's nomination and will use every honorable effort to defeat him. If nominated, we will diligently oppose his re-election.

The Law-Breakers

"Yes, as I was saying, the prohibition law in this town is a joke," said the Young Sport, directing his remarks at Old Man Ultimate Consumer, because that citizen had just said something about how much better the town was now the saloon was gone. "Why, I can get all I want any time. And I have learned how to make it, too. If any of you fellows want to taste, come over to the Club and I will be glad to quench your thirst."

"I don't see how that makes the law a joke," said the Minister. "It looks to me more like making you a law-breaker."

"No law has a right to take away my personal liberty," said the Young Sport loudly. "As long as I like I am going to get my drink, law or no law. And I say again the law is a joke because it is not enforced."

"And, of course, as a good citizen of the United States who is patriotic and loves his country, you don't feel any obligation to stand by the law and obey it," said Old Man Ultimate.

"I'm as patriotic as most," said the Young Sport. "But when my personal liberty is threatened, I believe I have a right to do as I please."

"But the city ordinance posted up in the streetcars says you must not spit on the floor of the car. You don't disobey that law, do you?" asked the Editor.

"That's different," said the Young Sport. "I don't care to spit on the floor, but I do care for my drink. And no government is going to deprive me of it. Besides, how do you take me to task for breaking law? All of you, even the Minister, break the city ordinances nearly every day."

"How's that!" say the Minister, the Editor, the Business Man, the Professor, the Man About Town, the Tax-Payer, and Old Man Ultimate.

"Why, I saw the Minister himself, in his new car which the church gave him, turn the corner into the Avenue the other day without holding out his hand at the turn as the ordinance requires. And he nearly hit me, in consequence."

"You mean that you nearly ran into me," said the Minister hastily. "But I'll plead guilty. I did forget at that corner. But I was thinking of my next Sunday's sermon."

"If you keep on doing that, it will be a funeral sermon for some one," said the Young Sport. "And then the Business Man sells cigaret-holders in his store. I saw a lady buying one there the other day. And we have a state law forbidding the sale of cigarets."

"But not cigaret-holders," said the Business Man hastily.

"What's the difference? You aid and abet the law-breaking by selling a thing that goes with cigarets."

"Ha! Ha!" said the Professor. "That's a good one!"

"But where do you come in?" said the Young Sport. "I saw you buying a holder the other day. How about you aiding and abetting the lawlessness?"

"Ha! Ha!" said the Editor. "Another good one."

"And how about you?" said the Young Sport. "You advertise the Busin Man's goods in your paper, includi the holder. I saw a cut of them in t morning's paper."

"That's another good one!" said t Tax-Payer. "Ha! Ha!"

"But when the tax assessor ca around yesterday I bet you never turn in the mortgage you told me you h on Brother Blank's place?" said t Young Sport.

"Well, none of the property hold in this town do. The law is an outra I only do what all the other mortga holders do," said the Tax-Payer.

"But it is breaking the law just t same, isn't it?"

"I suppose it is, technically," said t Tax-Payer.

"That's all I do when I break the p hibitory law, just a technicality. Fa is, we all break some law at some poi We are all law-breakers. I am not t only law-breaker," said the Young Spo

"I move we adjourn," said the Mi ister pensively. And the moveme carried. And the last seen of the You Sport he was speeding toward his Cl at ordinance-breaking speed to quen his thirst.

Just a Habit

The business woman stepped into little eating-place for a lunch. Just b hind her entered a man and a woma The man asked for two glasses of butte milk, and at the "Not for me" from t other, he said: "Just one, then—t lady does not wish any."

As they left, the business woman r marked to the man at the counte "Well, even if that woman did not wa buttermilk, it is better than in the o days, when a man had to leave his wi on the corner while he went in to p his foot on a rail and ask for whisk or beer."

The man smiled and nodded, as h replied emphatically, "Yes, mees, it e so. Dare ees not so mooch of dat ki of drinking any more, an' eet ees very mooch better. Dose folks who a workin' so hard for no more drink, de just need to wait one leetle while, a no one will want the drink no more all. Eet ees just a habit, dat ees all."

"Why, mees," he continued, waxin confidential, and leaning toward the bus ness woman as he spoke: "You see m Well, once I drink dat whisky an' be mineself, too, like others. But eet no goo for me or mine familee, an' long befor dose Volstead Acts he go troo, I mak mine mind oop I stop. For one lon time eet very hard, for I want eet s so mooch I can't tell you. The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, he is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Pitying her, he tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. At a small dinner she meets Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb. He encourages her to resist the appetite which has been held in check during her mother's visit, but it is roused by the fermented wine at communion, and only the refusal of Divan Singh to let her have liquor keeps her from being again overcome. Bertram Harford, hurt by a servant he had dismissed, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them.)

CHAPTER XVII.

Dr. Scott found Angela lying on her bed in a deplorable state of nervous debility. She was depressed to the point of despair. Her pulse was feeble, and she could not restrain tears.

"How long have you been like this?" asked the doctor.

"For several days. Oh, Dr. Scott, give me a stimulant, something to take away this awful sinking!"

"Have you had food lately?"

"No, I cannot eat, it is impossible; I cannot sleep, and I am utterly exausted!"

"Of course you are! Ayah!" she called; "I require tea for two, toast, butter and eggs: fetch it quickly." Then turning to Angela, "We will have a little meal together, and then you shall answer a few questions. Now lean on me, and I will raise you up. That is right! I am going to put you in this chair. There, now, you will soon be better!"

She put her strong arm round the slender girl and, lifting her, placed her in a chair with a cushion behind her and a footstool at her feet. Then, fastening up the blinds and letting in light, she brought eau de cologne, and bathed Angela's head, and brushed her hair, then seated herself close by with a fan. Her movements were brisk and cheery, and acted like a tonic on the invalid.

The tea came, and Angela was persuaded to take a cup largely diluted with milk, and a scrap of toast daintily buttered by Dr. Scott.

"Now, then, Mrs. Fortescue, tell me all about yourself. You are too much alone!"

"Call me Angela."

"What a pretty name it is!"

"Is it? I'm not much of an angel, though!"

"You are something like one outwardly."

"But that is nothing, if one is not so inwardly. I'm such a poor thing." She was on the edge of tears again.

"I can't allow you to be morbid."

"But I am a poor thing. Listen! and you will agree with me. You cannot know, Dr Scott, that I have to fight for life against a desire for drink; these last few days I have been in agony—I have been faint with desire! I dare not go out for fear I should meet my enemy and yield."

"But you have not yielded?"

"No! no! but at last I had to send for you or I should have."

"Thank God!"

"But, oh, I have suffered!" Then suddenly, "Don't let us talk about it, it is loathsome! I hate myself."

"Well, dear, we will not talk any more on that topic. I want to examine you, and ask some questions."

"Yes, do help me!"

"But first of all this egg and milk must be drunk."

Angela obeyed. After the examination and a catechism, Dr. Scott smiled at her patient, and said, "Cheer up, dear, I have good news for you; all going well, you will be a mother about the end of the autumn!"

"A mother! I?"

"Yes! Do you not want a little child?"

"A child?" Angela looked dazed, then a light came into her face; she laughed and the tears came.

"Oh, I am so glad! What will Frank say?"

"He will be delighted, without doubt!"

"Do you really think so?" Her face fell suddenly, and she dropped her head against her friend, saying with a sigh, "I'm not fit to be a mother!"

"You must remember that the little life will depend on you! You alone can guard it; you alone are responsible for it. The brain of your child will be affected if you indulge in drink. If you do not want to pass this craving on, you must abstain entirely. I warn you solemnly on this point, dear Angela. Mother-love is the strongest incentive in the world, and will perhaps triumph over your weakness."

Angela clasped her hands. "Oh, I will try. God help me!"

"Amen!" echoed her friend.

Fortescue returned a week later; he seemed glad to be back, and Angela met him with much affection. When they were alone she whispered to him her news.

A pleased smile irradiated his features. "That's right; give me a son and heir, little wife!"

At dinner he noticed that she had her place removed as far as possible from him.

"Why is this? Come nearer, here, close by me!"

"No, Frank; I'm here because I want to be out of the way of your wine. The scent is not pleasant to me!"

"However, you must get over it. Here, Divan Singh, take this to the Mem Sahib," and he pushed the glass of wine forward.

The servant hesitated.

"Divan, you need not, I shall not drink it." She trembled and looked apprehensively at her husband.

A smile spread over Divan's face.

"Very good, Mem Sahib."

Fortescue burst into a laugh. "You and Divan are in league to thwart me, I see! You have got into bad ways in my absence!" He said no more, thinking it was a new fad of Angela's—perhaps due to her condition.

The next time Dr. Scott called, Angela asked her to speak to her husband and tell him that alcohol was injurious to her in her state of health. "Then perhaps he will not offer it to me."

Dr. Scott consented. As she was leaving she met Fortescue on the steps.

"May I have a few words with you?"

"Certainly, come into the drawing-room."

"It is about your wife. You know her condition. I have advised her to take no alcohol, and I beg of you to support me in this. She needs great care, her brain is not normal, and for the child's sake she must abstain rigidly."

"You think so? Well, I don't agree with you; her spirits are so bad she requires something to keep her up."

"I speak as her medical attendant, from a scientific point of view," she answered somewhat haughtily.

"Have you undertaken to attend my wife? I thought you were a missionary."

"Your wife wishes it, and I shall be glad to help her!"

"Indeed! Well, I make no promise of any kind."

Dr. Scott flushed hastily, and left him.

"Like her impudence to install herself Angela's doctor without consulting me! A woman 'doctor'!" He at once sat down and wrote:

"Dear Madam,

"As I have not engaged you as my wife's medical attendant, I request you to be good enough not to call again. I enclose check for 100 rupees as acknowledgment of your past services.

"Yours truly,

"F. Fortescue."

An hour later an envelope was handed to him. It contained the check returned without a word.

exposed by their homes, or neglect, to such tendencies, proves most conclusively that the kindergarten effects an immense pecuniary saving to the community, not only in diminishing expenditures otherwise necessary for police and protective measures, but in rendering what would otherwise be a criminal population a part of a useful, law-abiding, self-supporting membership of the state.

"The kindergarten aims especially to develop the child on his social and moral side. He learns that what is customary in the mutual relations of right thinking people is right. He learns, through active co-operation in games and associated work, that without kindness, justice and truthfulness, social life is neither comfortable, nor for any extended time even possible."

Prohibition Brings Increase o Patronage to Moving Pictures

Commenting upon the recent action the State Federation of Women's Clu of New York, in petitioning movie pr ducers and editors to adopt a more serio attitude toward the Eighteenth Amen ment, Miss Georgia Hopley, the first w man general prohibition agent on th staff of Commissioner Haynes, said:

"The concerted action of all organiz tions of women, following the lead of th club women of New York, would prove moving force, representing a membersh of 2,000,000 in the General Federation Women's Clubs, one-half million me bers of the Woman's Christian Tempe ance Union, the number enrolled und the Young Men's Christian Associatio the Epworth League, the Christian E deavor and many others.

"It is generally conceded that the mo ing picture houses have become the mo popular place of amusement, entert ment and pastime of the people of tod and especially the young people and ch dren.

"It naturally follows, therefore, th the film productions will prove the pr eminent factor for good or evil in t molding of the future citizens of o nation.

"It is difficult to understand why e hibitors and producers permit demor izing, belittling and misrepresenti statements to be thrown on the scree setting forth and depicting infractions the law, since it is a well known and wid ly acknowledged fact that the increase patronage of the movies stands out co spicuously as one of the noticeable r sults of prohibition. The benefits accr ing therefrom would not be forthcomi in the event of the return of the form days of the open saloon and widely a cessible drinks."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

MORE CHAPLAINS NEEDED TO INSURE WELFARE OF BOYS — RENEWED INTEREST IN INDEPENDENT CITIZENSHIP FOR MARRIED WOMEN — FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES — THE LINCOLN MEMORIAL — COMMITTEE ACTION ON BONUS BILL — ACTION ON RECLASSIFICATION BILL EXPECTED SOON

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

More Chaplains Needed to Insure Welfare of Boys

With military reduction—scrapping of ships, discontinuing camps and the reduction in the number of soldiers and sailors—there came a disposition on the part of the legislators to reduce the number of chaplains in the Army. This long neglected branch of the ministerial service was rehabilitated during the war, the number of chaplains increased and the standard raised, due in large measure to the labors of Bishop McDowell.

A too drastic cut was made by the House, which reduced the number of chaplains from 179 to 105. The Senate yesterday amended the House Appropriation Bill, which carried this provision, by increasing the number by 31, which would make the final total 136. For a period of five months there will be 158; then the number will be reduced to 136. The bill now goes to conference.

The W. C. T. U. is lending its influence to persuade House conferees to accept the amendment. Since fighting ceased, people generally are sadly unmindful of the welfare of the standing army. Through our department of Social Welfare—Soldiers and Sailors—much interest has been aroused in the welfare of the boys.

Renewed Interest in Independent Citizenship for Married Women

The introduction by Representative L. Cable of Ohio of another bill—H. R. 11773—to provide for independent citizenship for married women, has helped to renew the interest in this proposed legislation. Mr. Cable's bill is the fourth proposing separate citizenship.

The Johnson Naturalization Bill—H. R. 10860, Curtis—H. R. 2828, and Rogers—H. R. 15, all provide for this principle. The provisions vary slightly.

The purpose of the legislation is to correct the injustice which present laws inflict on American women who marry foreign men, and to require foreign-born women who marry American men to pass the same tests required of foreign born men if they become citizens of the United States. Under each of the bills women must be American citizens, residents of the United States at time of marriage; and their citizenship shall be protected only so long as they continue to be residents of this country.

Instances of injustice to American women who have wedded foreign-born men living in the United States, and have thereby invalidated not only their political status, but their economic positions and professions, are many.

Mr. Cable, commenting on his bill, said:

"The laws of the United States should be amended to permit these women to become citizens of the United States. In addition there are more than 2,250,000 female aliens 21 years and upward in the United States who are not naturalized.

"Under our law any woman who marries a citizen of the United States and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, automatically becomes a citizen. This citizenship by marriage may be acquired without the woman being able to speak our language, without a study of our Constitution, and without even appearing in court and renouncing allegiance and fidelity to her foreign ruler, and without taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. Naturalization papers may be filed legally by an unmarried woman who is otherwise qualified, or by the widow of a foreign-born person not naturalized, but not by a woman during the existence of her marital relation."

France and the United States

This week a ceremony took place at the White House which, though somewhat obscured by the greater program of the week, should have particular note.

Ambassador Jusserand presented to President Harding the American flag that was displayed with the French tricolor on the Eiffel Tower when the word came that the United States had entered the world war. In the course of his grateful, eloquent speech the ambassador said: "All things we know come to an end; such will be the fate of the friendship between France and America—the day when the stars shall fall from the sky or from the flag of the United States."

No greater compliment could be paid to the stability of the government and no greater confidence could have been expressed in the maintenance of international friendship. The ambassador likening the stars in the American flag to those in the skies, gave expression to a belief that is at the basis of American national character.

President Harding, on his side, expressed the feeling of this country to France when he said:

"Probably it adds little to the beauty of the Stars and Stripes and their wonderful coloring to have been saluted with the love and affection and reverence of your republic, but it does add much to that for which the flag stands. It means a new tie, a new bond of affection between your republic and ours. It means a new assurance that the cordial affection and respect of the one republic for the other will endure, as you have suggested, for all time to come."

The Lincoln Memorial

The magnificent temple in which the great statue of Lincoln is enshrined was formally presented to the nation by Chief Justice Taft, Chairman of the Lincoln Memorial Association, at the dedication ceremonies on the afternoon of May 30, in the presence of 50,000 people. In the name of 110,000,000 Americans, the President of the United States accepted this beautiful memorial.

With the Washington Monument looking down upon the temple, President Harding declared that Washington, the founder, and Lincoln, the savior, "offered outstanding proof that a representative popular government, constitutionally founded, can find its own way to salvation and accomplishment."

Dr. Robert Moton, president of Tuskegee Institute, spoke in behalf of the negroes of America.

"Lincoln, the Man of the People", was the title of a poem written and read by Edwin Markham.

Ambassadors from many lands, members of the President's Cabinet, members of the Senate and House, and other special guests occupied the platform where the exercises were held, while many thousands of persons stood in the great spaces flanking the reflecting pool. By means of "loud speakers" every word of the ceremony was distinctly heard by all.

One of the features of the dedication was the two groups of soldiers of the Civil War, one group in blue and the other in gray, both standing proudly at salute as the star-spangled banner blew in the gentle breeze that wafted across the park.

Committee Action on Bonus Bill

The Soldier Bonus, known as the McCumber Bill, has been voted on favorably in the Senate Finance Committee the vote standing 9 to 4.

The more important changes in the House measure follow:

Changing of the effective date of the legislation from next October to January 1, 1923.

Removal of the time limitation on the filing of applications by world war veterans for adjusted service compensation.

Abandonment of the reclamation plan and the substitution of a provision under which veterans would be given preference in making entry on public or Indian lands when such are opened to entry.

Elimination of the forfeiture provision under which veterans failing to repay loans made by banks of the government on adjusted service certificates would have forfeited their certificates.

Under the amended bill such veterans could reclaim their certificate at any time before their maturity 20 years from the date of issue upon payment of the sum they were in default plus interest at 4 ½ per cent compounded annually.

Action on Reclassification Bill Expected Soon

Appointment of a sub-committee of the Senate Appropriations Committee to consider the Lehlbach Reclassification Bill, and a conference between Senator Sterling, chairman of the Civil Service Committee, and President Harding were the developments yesterday in the movement to obtain passage through the Senate before July 1, of the reclassification measure. The bill has already passed the House.

This sub-committee appointed yesterday by Senator Warren, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is composed of Senators Smoot of Utah, Curtis of Kansas, McKinley of Illinois, Lenroot of Wisconsin, Overman of North Carolina, Harris of Georgia, and Glass of Virginia. A meeting of the sub-committee will probably be held next week.

Following his fifteen-minute talk with the President yesterday, Senator Sterling expressed the hope that the Senate will act on reclassification before July 1. He found the President cognizant of the need of reclassification of Federal employes, and well acquainted with the details of the proposed legislation.

Home Brew on Decline

Federal Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes is in receipt of reports from New England, to the effect that the demand for yeast, hops and malt has dropped off by half since the peak of the "home brew" fad was reached.

One report reads:

"I have talked with scores of people who have tried their hand at making beer at home. Most of them have found it difficult to make two batches alike. It makes a lot of work and muss in the house and every little while an installment blows up in the bottles or cask and fills the house full of an odor of yeast and other things for a week or ten days. The result has been that a good many people who started in to make their own have given it up in disgust and turned their attention to other forms of amusement."

Another report tells of a similar situation regarding New England moonshine:

"Except for those with an extreme appetite for alcohol, the concoctions from the illegal stills do not appeal. They are mostly too rank and raw. Efforts to defeat prohibition have overcome themselves."

Dry Law Reduces Number of Iron Work Accidents

Figures submitted at a recent meeting of the Bridge and Structural Iron Workers' union of Chicago showed, according to the press, that in 1917, after the closing of saloons on Sundays, there was a big decrease in Monday and Tuesday accidents, and that there had been a decline in these from 24 per cent in 1919, before prohibition became effective, to 19 per cent in 1920, under the dry regime.

Money in the Bank Now

The Keyless Lock Co., of Indianapolis, reports that "We can now see that the liquor traffic was a more deadly and dangerous peril than we even imagined. A wonderful difference is reported in the condition of the workmen, who live better, in better houses, and most of whom have money in the bank."

Bishop Lines of Newark, N. J. Calls on Churchmen to Support Dry Law

"Get the testimony of those who know more about the effects of prohibition than organizers of great meetings of protest," declared Bishop Edwin S. Lines in his address at the annual convention of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Newark, New Jersey, held recently, as he urged the delegates to use their influence for the observance of the Eighteenth Amendment. "We know that many officials tell us that the laws cannot be enforced, while they do not seriously endeavor to execute them," said the bishop, according to the New York Evening Sun of May 16. "I quite appreciate the difference of opinion both as regards the wisdom of placing this subject in the Constitution and some of the methods used to enforce it. But the trade in strong drink, with its disregard of fair regulation, its corruption of our political life, its destruction of what is best in human life, has received what it deserves and drawn its punishment upon itself.

"Much of the talk about the destruction of personal liberty is unworthy of respect. The talk of many people living in luxury in great houses, with more than their share of the world's good things, about the wrong done to the poor by prohibition, is ridiculous. The gulf between the privileged and unprivileged must be bridged in some way other than by common freedom to obtain strong drink.

"It is no wonder that with so many officials in our cities indifferent or worse; with the newspapers filled with poor jests about drinking and the violation of law; with the foolish talk of artists and writers about inability to produce the highest work under prohibition; with politicians saying that men and women should not be deprived of the personal liberty to destroy their bodies and souls, to rob their families of a decent living, to fill jails and asylums with the victims of strong drink—it is no wonder that we should be passing through our present experiences."

No Crime Wave in New York, Says District Attorney

In a speech at the City Club of New York, District Attorney Joab H. Banton declared that there was no "crime wave," but that he was glad of "the recent newspaper hysteria" because it enabled him to get needed prosecution machinery. Mr. Banton said, according to the New York Evening Post, that in January, February and March of 1917 there were 700 more major crimes than in the same period in 1922. He maintained that crime prevention begins with the child, for whom he believes a careful religious education is essential.

Nomination in Pennsylvania of Dry Candidates for the Governorship Severe Blow to Wets

The nomination by both the leading parties in Pennsylvania of dry candidates for the governorship, seals the doom of the liquor traffic in the state for the next four years. Gifford Pinchot, the Republican candidate, has long been an outstanding figure in the prohibition movement, making this an issue in his great contest with Senator Penrose in 1914. John A. McSparran, the Democratic nominee, has been equally prominent in temperance activities. Some years ago he was for a time a member of the state board of trustees of the Pennsylvania Anti-Saloon League, and for one year served as a member of its headquarters committee. Mr. Pinchot has been a member of the board since 1915.

Social Center as Substitute for Saloon

According to an Associated Press dispatch from Berlin, one of the most effective weapons in the fight being carried on against drink by the official, civic, and religious element in new Germany is the social center devised as a substitute for the saloon. These "people's homes," as they are called, are to afford men, women and young people of all classes a common meeting place, with an opportunity for healthy pastimes and social activities.

The movement for the establishment of these homes is being led by the former mayor of Berlin, Dr. Reiche, and is being strongly supported by organizations of the younger generation, who realize the great danger to the country in the rapidly increasing consumption of alcohol, which amounted to over thirty billion marks in 1921, and which it is estimated will be double that this year, in spite of the comparative lack of nourishing foods in Germany.

Liquor Barred by Sigma Delta Kappa

According to the Chicago Tribune of May 14, the Sigma Delta Kappa fraternity, at the closing session of its convention at the Hotel Sherman, passed a resolution advocating that the letter and the spirit of the Eighteenth Amendment be observed.

Anti-Mosquito Work Hampers Rum Runners

"Word received indirectly at mosquito headquarters from bootleggers is to the effect that they object to the city's oiling the pools on the islands along the river, according to W. H. Martin, mosquito assistant," says the El Paso (Texas) Herald.

"Bootleggers have to wade through these pools in getting their liquor across the river and they get rings of oil around their trouser legs by which the prohibition officers identify them," said Mr. Martin.

"Another objection is that much of the brush is being cut and burned away, eliminating many good hiding places."

Give the Law Time to Show Its Worth

That the prohibition movement in other parts of the world will be influenced by its success on this continent was the opinion recently expressed by Lord Leverhulme, while in Canada, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

"It seems to me that both the friends and opponents of prohibition are too impatient for results," said his lordship. "The alcohol habit is not a natural one, but is acquired, and the children of this generation will not acquire it.

"When the bootlegger meets the new generation which knows not alcohol he will find himself without customers or encouragement. You are making a very interesting experiment here and in the United States, which is being watched by other countries."

Well-Known Prelate Urges Obedience to Prohibition Law

Influenced by his observation of the great good that came to the people of Florida after 90 per cent of the state went dry under local option, Archbishop Curley, in a recent address in Baltimore to the Knights of Columbus is reported by the New York Times of April 22 to have said that if he had a million votes he would not cast one of them in favor of the saloon, and suggested that if the prohibition law is unpopular the people should repeal it, but that so long as it is on the statute books it should be respected.

Southern Bishop Makes Stirring Appeal for Support of Dry Law

In his report to the council of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, in session recently in Christ Church, Roanoke, Virginia, Bishop Robert Carter Jett made a stirring appeal for support of the prohibition laws. "The church owes its full allegiance to civil government," he is reported to have said, and urged all who profess to be Christians to support the prohibition laws, regardless of personal approval or disapproval, as long as they remain on the statute books.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT OF AMERICANIZATION CO-OPERATES IN PLAN FOR SAFE, SANE AND APPROPRIATE FOURTH OF JULY

The National W. C. T. U. department of Americanization, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director, has promised co-operation in carrying out a comprehensive program suggested by the League of Foreign Born Citizens, at the invitation of the National American Council, to be participated in by organizations throughout the country in making nation-wide the celebration of Independence Day in a safe, sane and appropriate manner.

The announcement for this program says, in part:

"Independence Day, each year, should mark a re-dedication of America, by native and foreign-born together, to the ideals and to the principles of the founders of the nation. It should mark the formal uniting in solemn consecration to American principles, of both the American by birth just about to attain his majority and his equal power in the moulding of the country's affairs, and the newly naturalized citizen.

"An Independence Day program should be an impressive and dignified ceremony that will properly evidence the importance of the advent of these new recruits into our citizenry and recognize the united forces of the native and foreign-born people.

"The local chairman of each community, in conjunction with the mayor will bring about the selection of representative prominent men and women to act as a committee in charge of the arrangements for the celebration.

Remembering that every wife automatically becomes a citizen and voter upon the naturalization of her husband, these wives should be given a prominent place and made to feel the importance of the occasion. The husbands should be urged to make it possible for their wives to learn English and study with some agency doing Americanization work. —Culla J. Vayhinger.

"Every city and town—wherever it is possible to gather an assemblage—should plan a public meeting, a Civic Court of Honor. In conjunction with the public meetings there should be a parade or pageant. To give a true conception of the cultural contribution of the foreign born citizens there may be floats or tableaux depicting their historical and artistic background. A prologue should also include scenes depicting in panorama the magic story of our own country.

"The Boy Scouts of America, through their national office, have kindly and cordially volunteered their services which can be made use of in connection with this arrangement.

"The meetings should be addressed by leading citizens and public officials. There should also be an address by a new prospective voter and by a new citizen, who should state what their new status means to them and their realization of its solemn responsibility. The addresses by the public officials or by the distinguished speakers should stress th meaning of America and the part it ha played in the development of the idea of government based upon the consen of the governed.

"There should be songs—the folk song of the old country, possibly, sung by eac foreign group, and patriotic America airs sung by all.

"Small American flags should be di tributed to the audience and each shou pledge allegiance to the flag. Flags shou be displayed from homes, store window all public buildings and as generally a possible.

"The native born and foreign bor citizens should each receive an appropri ate button or other insignia to keep a memento.

"There should be leaflets distribute which the new foreign-born citizen ca pass on to his friends, showing the a vantages and the necessity of becomin a citizen.

"A message from the President of th United States should be printed in a tractive form and presented to each the new citizens.

"The governor of each state and th mayor of each city should issue an a propriate proclamation.

"Wherever exercises are held indoo or in the open in the evening there shou be motion pictures depicting the progre of American democracy and slides co taining quotations on citizenship from t master minds of the Republic."

W.C.T.U. Service at Ellis Island

Charlotte B. Fraser

It was my privilege for three weeks in April to be at Ellis Island where I had the chance to study, at very close range, the inner workings of the Government. It is a sacred mission to spend day after day at the gate-way of America and to give a little comfort and aid to our new friends. Mrs. Athena Marmaroff, who has given so many years of her life to this work, is more familiar with it than others but some of my impressions while over there as a W. C. T. U. representative, may be of interest. With the three per cent quota now at least partly understood by immigrants, the misunderstanding of last year will not be repeated and the Government officials and welfare associations will not be overtaxed as before.

Each person coming over to this shore is a human case and cannot be treated in the bulk. The majority of immigrants coming through Ellis Island have no trouble and are passed on to their respective places of destination. But there are also those who have to be detained for one reason or another, and it is their special cases that the welfare organizations can help in so many ways. The W. C. T. U. has been at the Island for a long time, and has been able to help many in perplexity or distress.

A most interesting case came to me while there. A Scotch girl was detained for the following reason: Just before leaving Scotland a friend of hers had asked if she would look after two children coming out to an uncle in America. She was very happy to help in this way and all went well until her arrival at Ellis Island, where she was held as "legal guardian" for the children. She had to spend several days there until necessary steps could be taken and the children claimed by their uncle. Another girl came over to fill a position as maid, showing a signed contract. She, therefore, came under the "contract labor" and was detained. These are only two of the many cases that are handled day by day.

What a privilege, what a duty, what a responsibility lies upon us as we try to comfort, help, and encourage those who for some unforeseen reason are held at Ellis Island.

Commissioner Todd is to be congratulated on his splendid work as head of this department.

Easter Sunday morning, at the services at the Island, I sang several hymns and, though the words could not be understood by all present, the radiance on the faces of many showed they felt that they were really in the presence of God.

The Case of Mrs. Gavronich

Clara Ansorge Fuller

They came from one of the small provinces in Southern Europe, this woman and her three big boys. For many years Mr. Gavronich had been in America, working hard, and preparing a dwelling for his family. At the close of the war, he made the long journey, and returned with them, and Mary, the buxom young sister of the wife.

Mary attended the English class ne her home, and absorbed the langua as a sponge does water. The boys t tended the public school of the cit The man "work box-fact'ry" and were happy.

Before the year was up, the nine-yea old boy sickened and died and the country people did their best to comfo the sad parents. Not long after, a de baby boy came to the home, but three weeks, he, too, was taken fro them. Words fail to describe the trage of the poor mother unable to speak word of English. The teacher who, her former visit, had seen how sick t baby was, clasped the poor, lone moth in her arms, and made her understa her sympathy, though her words were n understood.

From that time on, the door alwa opened quickly, and Mrs. Gavroni would draw her teacher into the roo smiling broadly when she was able say, "Fine day". Week by week, h vocabulary increased. In the meantim Mary had gone to work, and her sis proudly explained, "Mary work. Che get every week."

It takes time to do this personal wor Certainly, but how else can the lon mother be reached. She locks her do and fears to venture out, and only wh she knows it's the friendly teacher, w she turn the key.

One day, looking at a picture in adult reader, where the women w shown smoking cigars, the teacher sa "I do not like" and put the pencil in h mouth to illustrate smoking. "No, n said Mrs. Gavronich, "No like smo Bad. Boys no smoke. Husband smoke; too much money". The teach congratulated her and left for the n home, saying as she went, "Next Frida

Elizabeth A. Perkins, National Director

We call upon all people interested in Child Welfare to sacredly guard the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to resolve that the Prohibition Enforcement Act shall not be weakened; and to assist in nominating and electing to office those who are pledged to the support of these high measures.

MOTHER-CHILD CENTER IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

A beautiful work is being carried on in the Mother-Child Center in Washington, under the care of District of Columbia Union, Number Two.

Mrs. Alma J. Scott, president, her staff of officers, and members of the local union, are determined to make this a Mother-Child Center worthy of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—one which shall be a real blessing to the section in which it is located.

Early last December the lower floor of what had formerly been a community house, though vacant for some time, was rented and the work begun. The three rooms are well lighted and in every way fitted for a Mother-Child Center.

Each local union accepted a quota of the expense, so that, with some help from Mother National, the rent, the salary of a worker, and incidental expenses might be taken care of, and courageously and faithfully have the unions raised this money.

On the walls of the three rooms, are posters loaned by the national department of Child Welfare—posters on the care of the baby, health posters, and posters to be used in memory work.

One of the front rooms has been immaculately fitted up for a baby clinic. Everything is in white—chairs, tables, a crib and a beautiful cabinet with glass doors, in which is a model layette and a mother's comfort kit.

The baby clinic, held every Wednesday afternoon, is in charge of a regular physician, assisted by his wife, who is a trained nurse.

The Center is open every afternoon from one until five o'clock, and the children are given Bible teaching, lessons in health and character building, and taught singing and handiwork.

Who can estimate the value to the child, to the parent, to America of such work as this?

Child Welfare Studies

Conducted by E. A. P.

To Every Child Belongs the Right

- To be well born
- To be educated
- To be protected from child-labor
- To be morally safeguarded
- To be spiritually trained

Questions answered by the Iowa Child Research Station:

1. Why is the only child at a disadvantage?

Ans. The only child lives too much with adults and is generally out of adjustment with children of its own age. It develops habits of solitary play and becomes a being frequently indulged and "spoiled," and in later life often finds it very hard to make a normal social adjustment.

2. What should be done with a left-handed child?

Ans. Let it use the preferred hand. A great deal of unhappiness results from forcing a child to use the awkward hand. To some children speech defects and nervous disorders may result.

3. Why should children have pet animals?

Ans. It is natural for children to be interested in animals, and they can learn a great deal of natural history from keeping pets. The responsibility of caring for them is invaluable in character training.

4. Should a child have household duties to perform?

Ans. Every boy and girl should have some regular task to perform at a regular hour. Be sure that it is one that the child recognizes as being really useful for the comfort of the household. Boys, as well as girls, should be taught cooking and housework.

5. Should a child live on schedule?

Ans. The day should be carefully planned, and the child should understand what sort of activities are scheduled for various times, and be helped to take an interest in them. A few minutes, at the end of the day, spent in "summing up," to see if things were really done on time, will develop good habits.

6. Should every child take music lessons?

Ans. Decidedly not. If a child is not gifted musically it should not be forced to "practice." There are psychological tests, which show whether a child has capacity in that direction. All children can, however, be taught some appreciation for music, by being trained to listen to it.

7. What is mental deficiency? What is its cause? Can it be cured?

Ans. A condition of an individual who is undeveloped mentally, and so lacking in general intelligence that he cannot compete on equal terms with his fellows. This condition is usually hereditary and it often appears in families where there are other forms of nervous and mental disorders. It cannot be cured, and a defective child will never become normal, but may be trained to happiness and usefulness in a limited sphere.

8. Should a child be rewarded for right-doing?

Ans. Yes, but do not let this be a bribe, but rather a natural reward of right action, similar to the rewards of every-day life in the working world.

9. At what age should a child be allowed to play the phonograph for himself, putting on the needle, choosing and putting on the record?

Ans. A well developed child can do this at three years.

10. At what age should a child have an allowance? Should he be permitted to spend, or save it, as he wishes?

Ans. At six the child usually knows the denominations of common coins and can count thirteen pennies. A small allowance will teach him the value of money. He should be encouraged to save money and to spend it for some end that he recognizes as desirable. Just putting it in the bank for him means nothing to his development, because he cannot look forward sufficiently to realize the value of saving for a distant end.

Prohibition Cuts Down Admissions to Indiana's Jails

A reduction of 39 per cent in admissions to the county jails of Indiana during the period the state has been under prohibition, state and national, is the evidence being presented by the advocates of the dry law.

The following figures have been given by Amos W. Butler, secretary of the State Board of Charities: During the wet period from 1902 to 1917 there was a total annual average of admissions of 36,400, and for the four dry years from 1918 to 1921 the annual average was 22,021.

"Back of the figures are certain facts which must be taken into consideration, such as the opening of the Correctional Department of the Woman's Prison in 1908 and of the Indiana State Farm at Putnamville in 1915, both of which had a marked effect in reducing the number of misdemeanants, especially in the matter of vagrancy. The World War and the unusual labor conditions attending it decreased the prison population in Indiana as elsewhere.

The Prohibition Law, however, did more than all other local influences combined, to stop the stream of admissions to these institutions.

There used to be an average of more than a thousand plain drunks sent to jail in Indiana every month. The present average is from 200 to 300 a month. The table shows that for sixteen years prior to 1918, when the prohibition law was passed, an average of 36,400 persons was admitted to the county jails annually. The reduction is 39%. The greatest number of admissions in any one year in the period of twenty years was 45,750 in 1915. There were 24,984 in 1921. This was 11,416 fewer than the average from 1902 to 1917."

Testimony of Indiana Judge and of Miss Elliott of Woman's Prison

Judge James A. Collins, of the Criminal Court in Indianapolis, says:

"In the four years 1910 to 1914 when the saloon was at its height, about 10,000 men and women answered the roll call as 'drunks'.

"Another 10,000 for offenses committed while under the influence of liquor.

"Another 10,000 for delinquency caused primarily by liquor. Prohibition has brought about the practical elimination of these cases."

Miss Elliott of the Woman's Prison says:

Average attendance month of September, 1917	226
Average attendance month of September, 1918	114
Average attendance month of September, 1919	93
Average attendance month of September, 1920	78
Average attendance month of September, 1921	99

Neglect of children and "joy riding" principal causes of increase in 1921. Nothing ever helped so much as prohibition. Out of 100 cases in succession the original cause of 95 was liquor. One woman committed 23 times, seen on the street recently, reported having just deposited several hundred dollars in the bank and said she was "not drinking now and had money."

BEFORE AND AFTER PROHIBITION IN THE FAMILIES O DRINKERS

Incidents from the Experiences of Visiting Nurses

(Sent by Alma C. Haupt, Superintendent of The Visiting Nurse Association of Minneapolis

One family, consisting of father, mother, and five children, had been known to the visiting nurses for a number of years. The father spent most of his time in the workhouse. When out, he worked just long enough to go back in again. The mother did day work and cared for her five children as best she could. On one visit to the home the nurse found the mother in bed. She volunteered no information as to her injury, but said she had severe pains in her leg. Twins, aged three, were in the kitchen helping themselves to oatmeal on the stove. An older child said that the father had pushed the mother downstairs and thrown a chair at her. On examination the mother's leg was found to be broken at the ankle, also the bones of the thigh. She was sent to the hospital and the children were placed in the care of the Children's Protective Society. The father, as usual, went back to the workhouse.

The family was not heard from for several months. Our next visit was about a year ago when the nurse was called to the home to see one of the children. The first thing that caught her eye on entering was a large diploma from the School of Chiropractics. The father now has an office downtown and the mother when last seen was wearing a fur coat.

Although Mr. H. had steady employment, he had always been dependent on charity. He was intoxicated most of the time. The four children were without necessary food and clothing. The man and woman quarreled constantly. At one time, when his wife was seriously ill, she refused to go to the hospital because of a previous experience when she found on her return that her husband had neglected the family, had moved into a house with colored people and claimed to have had illicit relations with them.

After prohibition came into effect the visiting nurse had occasion to call again on the family. She found the home in a better locality and cleaner; the man was supporting the family under the supervision of a social agency; the man and woman did not quarrel in the presence of the nurse as before; the family had enough food; the children were cleaner and better dressed; the woman seemed to take more interest in the home a had made preparations for the expect baby, something she had never done f the other children. The visiting nurs have seen the man several times recent but never intoxicated.

Mr. L. had been drinking heavily f years. He would go on periodic spre at which times he would be violent, bre up the furniture, and drive his wife a children out of doors. There was an o barn in the neighborhood where th spent two or three days and nights a time shivering in the cold and not d ing to come out. The wife was not we but had to take in washing to suppo the family as often the husband's entl pay check would go for drink. Becau of the disgrace, she struggled on f years without appealing to the auth ities.

After prohibition came the husband w very sullen for two months. After th he straightened up and became dece to the family. He worked and paid t bills, and when Saturday evening ca he would clean up and tell his wife hurry and get the supper dishes wash so they could all go to a show. When t nurse saw Mrs. L. she was still taki in some washing to help her husba "catch up", she said. She was very hap and said that though she was told th now saloons were out of business, livi was high and taxes soaring, she felt s would gladly give $5.00 extra and take washing to earn it to have this gr change in her family. She knew oth drunkards' wives would do the same.

The head of the S. family was a hea drinker. Mrs. S. said a day had n passed since they were married, 16 ye ago, that he had not come home dru After prohibition he did not drink dur the week, but on Saturday after be paid he would come home drunk. would drink extractions, moonshine, anything he could get. Even so, the w thought it better to have it only onc week than every night.

Mobilize a Million Members

CONTINUE THE DRIVE DURING THE SUMMER

IOWA W. C. T. U. TO HAVE SUMMER MEMBERSHIP DRIVE TO BEGIN JUNE 9 WITH FLOWER MISSION DAY MEETING AND CLOSE JULY FOURTH WITH A PATRIOTIC GATHERING

On June 9, a Summer Membership Drive of the Iowa W. C. T. U. is to be inaugurated by rousing parlor meetings held by all the local unions of the state, with invited guests. Stirring addresses showing the activity of the opponents of prohibition, and the distribution of literature, will help to get the campaign under way. Members will pledge service three hours for each of the three weeks, with three new members to be gained as the minimum objective. The state W. C. T. U. president offers a prize to the woman who secures the largest number of members this year. The campaign is to close with public patriotic meetings the day or the Sunday previous to the Fourth, at which time an effort will be made to get the "Star in the Window" poster in every window of every town.

MATERIAL

To every local union that is making systematic plans for the membership campaign the state will send two membership leaflets and one or more on beer and wine to be given out by workers. Members are urged to familiarize themselves with the leaflet "The A. A. P. A.—The W. C. T. U.," giving in parallel columns the purpose and plans of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment and those of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. "Every community must be reached with the TRUTH if we are to overcome the ERROR of the wets."

MONEY

An appeal is made for funds to buy literature. "We ought to spend thousands of dollars this summer to create reverence-for-law sentiment," urges the state W. C. T. U. president. "We can do nothing without the oil—money—to lubricate the wheels and make them go round. We cannot hire workers (as do the antis) but we can send out the printed word. Twenty-five cents per member is asked from the local unions to finance this work of distributing literature."

Three Rolls of Honor are to appear from month to month in the state paper: (1) Trio team subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. (2) Names of unions sending contributions for special funds. (3) Unions trebling their membership.

Every morning at eight o'clock at the state W. C. T. U. headquarters at Des Moines, Iowa, there will be a special season of prayer for the work and workers. At that hour the members in every city, town and village will join their hearts in prayer for the triumph of the prohibition cause.

Help Wanted

In the "Help Wanted" column in the Daily Northwestern of Oshkosh, Wis., March 20, 1922, appears this advertisement:

WANTED—Men and women who are real organizers to organize branch offices and campaigns in every county in the state. Only those who think the Volstead Act is an imposition on the American people need apply. Citizens Liberty League, Mrs. M. Roller, General Secretary, 636 M. & M. Bank Bldg., Milwaukee.

WANTED—Women who are "real organizers" to volunteer to organize unions and secure new members to established unions in every city in the United States. Only those who believe that traffic in alcoholic beverages of any kind is a menace to the health, happiness and general welfare of the nation need apply. For further information apply to nearest W. C. T. U. headquarters.

Get the Co-Operation of the Ministers

Bishop Edwin H. Hughes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, once said: "Our ministers ought to urge upon the young women in their churches the duty of connecting themselves with the efficient W. C. T. U. organization——There are few things that we can do that will better or farther advance our holy cause than to make the local organization of the W. C. T. U. large and vigorous. This plan will give us a corps of local helpers always ready for action when any crisis comes in any particular community."

Rev. Harry Adams Hersey, pastor of the St. John's Universalist Church of Muncie, Ind., made the following appeal, a few weeks ago, in the church bulletin: "It is my most earnest and fervent wish that every woman in St. John's Universalist Church join the W. C. T. U. Every woman who is not a member should join this week."

Plan a Dues Collecting Contest

Considerable interest and much real good can be brought about by having a Dues Collecting Contest, says the Oklahoma Messenger. Go over your present and past membership as far back as your records will go. Divide these names into two groups. Divide your present active membership into two teams. Start them out on a Dues Collecting Campaign. The team collecting their list of dues first, or those collecting the greatest number of dues, should be entertained in some way by the other team. The details can be worked out to meet the conditions in a community. The names of the present active members, as far as their own personal dues are concerned, should be assigned to the team of which they are members.

Indiana W. C. T. U. Out for 15,000 Women

"I am mailing 500 letters today. Indiana must have 15,000 women this month," writes the president of the Indiana W. C. T. U. "We are making a thorough canvass for enlistments. One county reports 200 new members."

National Organizer Wins Many New Members

New unions and new members in generous number was the result of Mrs. Ida D. Van Valkenburgh's ten weeks' tour of Mississippi. New unions were organized at eight centers, one Y. P. B., and one L. T. L. and a gain of 244 new members, 80 state members, 16 Y. P. B. members, 52 L. T. L. (colored members), was made.

More Important Than New Clothes

"Something to stir the righteous indignation of good citizens," writes Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, president of the Colorado W. C. T. U., "is the propaganda for beer and wine, which is being circulated in our state through a so-called 'Go-to-Church' publication. What are we doing to overcome the influence of the enemy? Numbers will count and my faith in Colorado white ribboners makes me believe that every one who reads this paper will decide that just now it is more important to enlist dry women and men as members of the W. C. T. U. than to clean house, make new clothes or entertain friends. Do a little work at this crucial time for God and future generations."

Are your local newspapers re-publishing the benefits of prohibition as they appear in print, from week to week, in THE UNION SIGNAL? The only way to clear the atmosphere of falsehood is to permeate it with truth.

The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment is getting the attention of the people by the distribution of its literature. What is your local union doing to refute the specious arguments of our opponents? W. C. T. U. leaflets on beer and wine and UNION SIGNALS should be used liberally in community centers, waiting stations, rest rooms. Let the people have the TRUTH about prohibition.

"Serve America; Support the Constitution"

Word comes to us of the new method adopted by the wets to spread their propaganda along state and national highways. There are being used on the windshields of autos red-white-and-blue squares, bearing the words, "Personal Liberty." Let us seize upon the idea of our "personal liberty" friends and place on autos our white star on the blue field, with the words, "Serve America; Support the Constitution." It might be helpful, moreover, to divide the unions into groups of twos or threes and canvass the town, "tagging" all autos.

The "Serve America" card can also be used in holiday parades, etc.

Let's Go, White Ribboners!

"Before and After Taking"

For a concrete example of what is being accomplished by Americanization work, we need only refer to the illustrations which adorn our cover page this week. One of the "good fairies" who bring about such wonderful transformations is Mrs. L. H. Lowe, in charge of Americanization activities for the W. C. T. U. of Englewood, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago. Assisted by a strong corps of workers from this organization of over five hundred consecrated women, Mrs. Lowe has been holding classes among the Mexican women who live in box cars down by the railroad tracks in South Chicago. Here, these women are being taught American customs, manners and mode of dress.

The first interior shows a home where American ways are just being introduced. These people speak only a word or two of English. The very neat home is that of Signora Marguerita Garcia, and her husband, with one boarder. Mrs. Garcia, a very good student, is rapidly learning English, and acquiring at the same time far more than a vocabulary.

DOES IT PAY?

Why Not Legalize Beer?

"I never drank a glass of beer in my life and I never expect to," remarks the eminently respectable citizen, "but I am wondering if perhaps the modification of the Volstead law to permit the return of beer may not be the solution of the problem. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment presents some plausible arguments. For instance, it says that a four per cent beer is non-intoxicating. Why not revise the definition of intoxicating liquors in the Volstead Act?"

Let an internationally known authority on brewing, Dr. Max Henius, for many years head of the Wahl & Henius Institute for Brewmasters of Chicago, answer: "It is utterly impossible by amending the Volstead Act to permit manufacture and the sale of beer and wine, as it is a recognized fact that wine is intoxicating and beer over three per cent may be," he is quoted in the Chicago press as saying. "The Eighteenth Amendment prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages. In order to have wine and beer restored to their former status, it would be necessary to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment."

"But," says the eminently respectable citizen, "the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment insists there will be no return of the saloon and the unspeakable conditions which went with it." This statement sounds well, but when one recalls that "beer was the saloon," that seven-eighths of the saloons were brewery-owned and the alcoholic liquor dispensed therefrom was more than 90 per cent lager beer, the force of the assertion is weakened, and one also recalls the products of the old-time bar room, the bums and booze fighters, who built up the fortunes of the millionaire brewers.

"But a modification of the Volstead Act to legalize the traffic in beer would bring in a billion dollars of revenue to Uncle Sam," suggests the eminently respectable citizen. Let Andrew J. Volstead, member of Congress and author of the Law Enforcement Code, answer that question.

"Most of the states have prohibition laws today that could not be repealed," says Mr. Volstead. "Without the consent of the state, beer and wine could not be sold, despite anything that Congress could do. Without open sale in the states no substantial tax could be collected.

"The following fourteen states forbid the sale of beer and wine whether or not they have any alcohol in them: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Mississippi, New Mexico, North Carolina, South Dakota, and Washington. That also, is true of the Territory of Alaska and the District of Columbia.

"The following twenty-two states forbid the sale of any beer or wine that has more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol: Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia and Wyoming; so do local option laws in Maryland. In Connecticut, Louisiana, Maine, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, the laws provide that the definition in the national prohibition act shall govern.

"The following states, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Texas, allow the sale of beer and wine containing one per cent of alcohol. California and Maryland are the only states that have no law on the subject."

If the above statements do not throw sufficient light on the undesirability of a return of the beer regime, inquirers are respectfully referred to a certain report of the United States Senate Judiciary Committee on the breweries and anti-American propaganda (given publicity during the war), showing the unprincipled, unpatriotic and reprehensible conduct of the brewers of America in connection with the war.

PITHY PROHIBITION PARAGRAPHS

THE HOME BREW FAD IS RAPIDLY PASSING, according to Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes. Most people find it impossible to make two batches of beer alike, it makes a lot of work, frequently it spoils, and occasionally it blows up in the bottles, or in the cask, and fills the house with disagreeable odors. After a few unhappy experiences the home brewer gives up in disgust.

CHOCOLATE COATED CANDY FILLED WITH LIQUOR is said to be sold in some of the larger cities. Prohibition agents are making a searching investigation for such sweet-meats.

FIVE DISTILLERS ARE TO BE PUT OUT OF BUSINESS in Kentucky and Pennsylvania, it is reported, because of conspiracies to defraud the government through forged liquor withdrawal permits. Prompt action by prohibition agents stopped shipments to New York.

A BILLIARD ROOM PROPRIETOR SAYS THAT HE DOES A BETTER BUSINESS THAN EVER BEFORE, although he sold whisky at his bar for fifteen years. "I stopped cold when prohibition went into effect," he is reported to have said. "Most of these fellows who denounce it do so just to agree with some loud-talking fellow, but they do not speak that way at home. I will lay even money that if it comes to a vote, New York City will go for prohibition."

ASSUMING THAT THERE IS AN INCREASE IN CRIME, as some papers would lead us to think (though, of course, we don't believe it; we pin our faith to statistics), why fasten the blame on prohibition? Dr. Frank Crane tells us that the increase is quite as marked in other countries, where the sale of alcohol is allowed, as it is in America, where it is forbidden; that crime statistics for France show that in the year 1919 there were 4,919 crimes committed throughout the country, and 5,149 in 1920. "The Night Clubs of London are far worse in their immorality than the bootleg joints of New York or Chicago," he asserts, according to the Des Moines (Ia.) Capital. "A reporter on the London Daily Mail, investigating these clubs, said, 'We cannot afford to laugh at the United States.' He describes the many revolting underground resorts which he discovered and demonstrates that the tendency to this sort of crime is not lessened by the fact that alcoholic liquors can be secured in respectable places."

ADVOCATES OF THE "PERSONAL LIBERTY" SLOGAN WOULD NOT WAIT EVEN TO HEAR MR. SAMUEL GOMPERS of the American Federation of Labor, scheduled to speak in Madison Square Garden, New York City, at a recent meeting of the New York division of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, we are told by the Christian Science Monitor. Before the program was half finished, the hearers began to wend their way out of the hall. They had evidently had more than enough of their own meeting.

FIVE DRINKING PLACES FOR FOLKS BUT NONE FOR ANIMALS was once the record of Delhi, New York, according to Mrs. Ruth Brehme, winner in the New York American's contest on the effects of prohibition. There was also a rickety jail that never lacked boarders. Its justices of the peace were busy; its poor-master busier. It was a lawyer's paradise. The various court sessions were so long that they nearly over-lapped. That was in wet days. Now it's different. Business booms, the jail is often tenantless, "poor-master" is an obsolete term, a solitary justice plays Rip Van Winkle, and a lawyer is hard to find. "There is a place or two where a horse or a long-legged dog can drink—that's all."

PERMISSION TO SUBSTITUTE A GLASS OF WATER FOR THE CUSTOMARY WINE drunk on the occasion of the "call" to the Inner Temple, was obtained, according to the Christian Science Monitor, by Miss Ivy Williams, a teetotaler, and the first woman to be admitted to the English bar.

Child Welfare from the Standpoint of the Brewer

Are the temperance forces of your community watching all the conditions that have to do with the children and young people in general, lest the training they have had along temperance lines should be undermined by liquor proponents? You may think there is no danger of such a calamity, but how, if the next generation does not learn to drink, will there be any hope for the future of the traffic? That the success which has been attained in the past through scientific temperance instruction in the schools of America has been noted by the enemy in England, and plans laid to prevent teaching of similar nature, may readily be seen in the following statement recently made by the Brewers' Journal to its British readers:

"Every year tens of thousands of our young people attain maturity. Few of them nowadays will have escaped the influence of teetotal propaganda, at any rate in some period of their youth. Half-truths as to the deleterious effect of alcohol when taken in excess will have been represented to them as applying to the moderate consumption of alcohol also.

"If the majority of our people, and the rising generation in particular, are not to become alcohol consumers, we may indeed ask, 'What's in a name?' The finest product, backed by the most famous name, will not induce a person to take a glass of beer or spirits who has permanently adopted total abstinence as his creed."

While this may be excellent testimony as to the value of temperance propaganda and what has thereby been accomplished, it also warns us to continue to be on our guard. And that, in the last analysis, the issue rests with the new generation is seen by the brewers, for the article bids the "Trade" remember that—

"It is not the beer drinker but the potential beer drinker that our opponents are most concerned with. It is the uprising generations that the teetotal party wish to enlist on their side."

Scientific Temperance Instruction, Child Welfare and Loyal Temperance Legion work all provide ways of circumventing the enemy. These departments must be emphasized more, rather than less. Are the schools of your city or village devoting time to teaching the truths concerning alcohol, or are they, under the necessity of including so many things in the curriculum, letting this important topic be passed by with little attention? Have you an L. T. L. and if so, are you laying the whole burden on one faithful soul, or is each member of the union doing her bit? Is your union stressing the department of Child Welfare, remembering the Eighteenth Amendment and its enforcement will do more for the children than for anyone else, or are you saying, "We have no one to take up the work"?

Remember: "It is the uprising generation" that we MUST enlist in the prohibition ranks.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Shew me thy ways, O Lord: teach me thy paths. Let integrity and uprightness preserve me: for I wait on thee.—Psalm 25:4, 21.

It Is Sacrifice That Makes All Deeds Effective

There is money and money. We are told that "a pound's a pound whoever gives it," whether Dives, who is burdened with abundance, or a widow, who is surrendering her all. "A pound's a pound whoever gives it." I have come to regard such speech as the most perilous and deadly nonsense. A pound may be a pound, whoever gives it, if you are only going to build a stable; but a pound may greatly differ from another pound if you are going to build the city of God. In these realms material gifts become shrines, and they may be full or empty of mystic spiritual power. I have come to believe that, if a spiritual presence can tenant a material body, it is not incredible that a spiritual influence can accompany a material gift. In these realms of character the giver determines the momentum of his gift. If there be sacrifice in the giver there will be spiritual power in the gift. I believe that all our offerings—of strength, or time, or money—have their virtue conditioned by the sacrifice which gave them birth. And, therefore, by this reasoning, the poor widow may give more than Dives; the lesser gift may be more effective than the greater.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

WHY I AM PROUD TO BE AN AMERICAN

Maude B. Perkins, National General Y. P. B. Secretary

A few months ago there appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL an article by Orlando Fioretta, superintendent of Americanization for the Y. P. B. Federation of New York. Mr. Fioretta is a ministerial student in Lima Seminary where Miss Willard was at one time preceptress. His call to service came some six years ago when the Italian Y. P. B. of Niagara Falls was organized. When asked to speak at a state Y. P. B. convention he selected as his topic, "Why I am Proud to Be an American." It is a subject worthy the consideration of every young man and young woman in America today. As we approach our national holiday, it is worth while to pause and review from its beginning our country's history. The struggles of the pioneers before the birth of our nation on July 4, 1776, the dauntless courage, the heroism, and the sacrifices of our forefathers, told in song and story, are among the classics of our age. The struggle to establish our nation may be ended but the struggle to uphold American ideals is the challenge to the young people of today. Just why are we proud to be Americans?

To the end that we may know what is in the minds of the members of the

An award of ten dollars will be made to the member of the Young People's Branch who submits the ten best reasons on "Why I am proud to be an American."

Young People's Branch, an award of ten dollars ($10.00) will be made to the Branch member who submits the ten best reasons on "Why I Am Proud to Be an American". The papers will be submitted to a committee of judges to select the one giving the best reasons. The articles must not be over two hundred fifty (250) words in length and should be in the hands of your national general secretary by August 1. Full name and address must appear on each paper.

The Fourth of July should be something more than a noisy celebration. Every sober minded individual must realize that these are perilous times—times when our country and her needs must have consideration. The question for us is not "Where may I have the best time?" but "Where may I best serve?"

As one scans the newspapers one is conscious that our lawyers give much time to the adjustments of legacies. Prohibition is our legacy and it must be settled before the Court of Public Opinion. How much time are we giving to the holding of our legacy? A noisy un-American minority is clamoring for the weakening of the Volstead Act. Who is to rule in America? A noisy minority, with an unmoral program, or a sober minded majority? In this crisis, we need the consecration, the enthusiasm, the energy and the courage of our young people. The Young People's Branch should initiate a sound program that will challenge every right minded young person in every community—a program of Americanism and Citizenship.

Many college students will be home during the summer. Make it a time for picnics, for poster hikes and for the more strenuous activities that appeal to young people. This may be in a sense, a vacation period, but let us make it a vacation period that shall count for the strengthening of the Volstead Act and the enforcement of National Constitutional Prohibition.

THE FINE ART OF BEING A CITIZEN

"Oh, dear, I haven't had a minute to look at my Citizenship lesson," wailed Madge Rogers, as she entered the room where the Young People's Branch was to meet. "I confidently counted on studying it on the train coming home from the office, but an acquaintance sat with me, and frittered away all that blessed hour in idle talk about the latest styles."

"Well, I never would prepare my lessons," remarked Jean Ingles quietly, "if I trusted to odd moments. With the very first chapter I started to get my family to discuss it at the dinner table. I saw no reason why we shouldn't chat about citizenship and the prohibition situation. So I began by teasing my big law student brother with puzzling questions concerning the Constitution, and of course that amused the high school lad and lassie who call me 'Big Sister,' and they'd get the book and read up in advance so as to show their learning. Mother has been so interested she started a class in the Woman's Club, and dad is just splendid in aiding and abetting me in making our tea-table talk what he calls, 'government gossip'. My young sister told me last night, with a great deal of pride, that she had received the highest mark in her Civics class because she had absorbed so much from these table discussions."

"I couldn't even attempt to match such a corking good story as that," commented Jane Comroy, "but I've a tale that may perhaps take second place. I'm one of those unfortunates, as you know, who is living away from home, and have to take at least two meals a day at a boarding house. You know the kind of talk at such places. It isn't always inspiring and sometimes it becomes caustic and supercritical, although the people at our boarding house are no worse nor better than the average, I imagine. Well, I was plain homesick for some worth-while talk, so one night I started in by asking a question or two on government matters as if I were densely ignorant, and it stimulated curiosity. A high school teacher and a theological student and a book-keeper began to be interested, and then I brought the 'Studies in Government' and tried them on the quiz at the end of the chapter, and will you believe it before we knew it we had turned that evening meal into a regular study class. Then, too, the chapter on the Eighteenth Amendment has given me a chance to fire a few shots for prohibition."

"That's great," approved Paul Roberts heartily. "But I've also a tale to unfold. As you all know, I am working in dad's foundry to learn the business from the bottom up. Most of the fellows don't know who I am, for I come down in overalls like the rest. I even take my lunch in a pail, and sit around and eat with them at the noon hour. To while away the period I started reading up on my 'Studies in Government,' in preparation for our class. One day while I was so engaged there came along a young Polander, who works near me, a fine young fellow who doesn't dream I am related to the boss. Smiling pleasantly, he asked, 'The little book good reading?' 'Dandy,' I replied heartily. 'Story?' he inquired curiously. 'No, all about how we run our government.' At this his face lighted and he said, 'That so? I like to read such book. I know not much English. Is it so hard?' I suggested, 'Suppose we read it together while we eat our lunch,' and we did, and I explained as we went along, and he takes to it as a fish to water. Then some of the other foreign chaps joined us, two of them had a pretty good education in their own lands; they are short on English but long on ambition, and when they found what we were doing they came over every day, until there's a whole bunch of us studying that little brown book and having a hilarious time over it. Some hot discussions we get into—in this international group—specially on the chapter on the Eighteenth Amendment. We're on that now. But the boys keep good natured and I've had a chance to get some ideas on the liquor and prohibition question over to them."

"Well, that certainly is a happy combination of Americanization and citizenship," said Professor Wood.

"Oh, don't call it by such high-sounding names," said Paul, flushing, "we're just a lot of fellows together. I can tell you I have learned as much or more from those overseas lads than I have given to them. And I've worked up an enthusiasm for this glorious old U. S. A. and its government."

The Morning After

Rosalind Scott Dunkin, National Director Publicity

When you wake up on Wednesday morning, November 7, your newspaper will tell you if the election has shown a strengthening of sentiment for or against a modification of the Eighteenth Amendment. Whether you are pleased with the result or disheartened, will depend upon the work you as an individual citizen contributed in the critical months before November 7.

There is no tomorrow when it comes to preparedness. It is now or never.

Publicity is one of the roads to prohibition success. Wherever the benefits of prohibition are published and people find out the high regard with which welfare, health, charitable, industrial and commercial leaders view the results of prohibition, a decidedly favorable reaction is noticeable.

Every W. C. T. U. woman should know the facts about prohibition and the beneficial results already widely recognized by representative mayors, bankers and other authorities. Opinions are not enough.

Watch your newspapers. Read them with a critical eye. If you don't like the newspapers as they are, change them! "Easier said than done", I hear you say. Not at all. Newspapers reflect in their editorial columns the ideas they believe to be popular. Don't blame an editor for what he prints if you never have written to him giving your side.

Editors are human beings just like other folks. They don't know what you are thinking about unless you tell them. Editors, being human, have about the usual percentage of virtues and vices. There isn't one editor in a hundred who would fight deliberately for something which he believed would injure his community. Your job is to put your side fairly and squarely up to the editor. Even if you register a complaint, that need not antagonize an editor. Wrap a smile around your words, then say your say with facts.

Mrs. R. S. Dunkin and son, William

When you see a good story in the newspaper, when you are pleased with the presentation of some W. C. T. U. news, or something appeals to you as being for constructive community good, call the editor on the telephone and tell him about it. At least write him a postal card, if you haven't time for a letter.

If you feel that the newspapers are all wrong, that they are against you and then don't try to change conditions, don't blame the newspapers.

Do you think for one moment if an editor received fifty letters complaining about some misstatement in his paper, that he would fail to sit up and take notice? Not a bit of it. Only through the co-operative effort put forth by every woman doing her part, can we hope to achieve adequate, constructive, beneficial publicity.

The National W. C. T. U. publicity office is right on the job, ready to help in any way, but unless you do your part, all the publicity material sent out will be in vain.

Remember the morning of November 7. Now is the time for action.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life.

MRS. ELLA B. WRIGHT, of Greensburg, Indiana. Deeply interested in philanthropic and reform work, Mrs. Wright was a leader in W. C. T. U. activities throughout the state. A delegate in 1920 to the World's W. C. T. U. convention, she was one of a group from the American delegation to lay a wreath on the statue of Lincoln in Edinburgh, Scotland. Mrs. Wright was an exemplification of the Christian woman at work in the world, spending her life in serving others.

MRS. BELLE EASTON, for twenty-five years identified with W. C. T. U. work and for the past ten years president of the Covington (Ky.), union. Prominent in many other organizations and in church circles, Mrs. Easton will be greatly missed by her comrades.

MR. GUSTAVE HAFLINGER of Maspeth, N. Y., oldest honorary member of the local union, of which his wife has for thirty years been vice-president. Beginning in 1903, Mr. Haflinger, with two or three exceptions, each year attended the state convention. He was for forty years superintendent of the Maspeth M. E. Sunday School, and in his passing the community, church and Sunday School suffer a distinct loss.

An Unasked-for Offering

(Mrs.) Azuba Jones

Recently reading in THE UNION SIGNAL an article by Mrs. Mary Harris Armor entitled "Catch the Vision," I find this statement: "If we win our million members by 1924, those who go out to speak should not have to ask for money—but for members only." This reminds me of an incident during a campaign for members in the eastern part of our state (Pa.) which further proves that the monetary phase of a campaign is not the most important, and that God will surely reward faithful, honest effort, not according to our faith, but according to His riches in glory. The speaker was engaged for two weeks to secure new members and organize new unions. Appointments had been secured in the largest churches, some of them granting such privilege for the first time to a woman speaker. Money was not to be mentioned, nor new members solicited, for those who had charge of the campaign valued the privilege of presenting our work above securing members or money, but where we were well organized we made a plea for both. At one of the institutes held, during luncheon a newly gained member told the speaker of the sum of seventy-five dollars she and her sister were saving for other purposes. Having heard, on Sabbath morning, of the wonderful work of our organization, they had decided to give two-thirds of the amount to the W. C. T. U. This sum was most gratefully accepted and forwarded to the state treasurer to procure two state life member certificates for the sisters. Finally, the other third was deposited that very day in the county treasury to carry on the work at home. Thus, at the close of the campaign, the speaker was enabled to submit a splendid report of $155 raised, three new unions and an L. T. L. with twenty-five members organized, ten subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL, nineteen to The Young Crusader and six to the state Bulletin secured, and 134 new members gained.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. At a small dinner she meets Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb. He encourages her to resist the appetite which has been held in check during her mother's visit, but it is roused by the fermented wine at communion, and only the refusal of Divan Singh to let her have liquor keeps her from being again overcome. Bertram Harford, hurt by a servant he had dismissed, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them. The doctor finds Angela ill and depressed, and at her request asks Fortescue to help his wife to resist her craving for liquor. Instead, he dismisses the doctor.)

CHAPTER XVIII.

Angela was deeply grieved by the turn of events, and she resented her husband's interference greatly. Her revived affection died down. She drooped as the heat increased, refused to go to any party, though occasionally she went to look at the tennis playing when Harford was there.

"Why do you never ask Mr. Harford to dinner?" she asked her husband.

"I hate the fellow! He is such a prig!"

"Indeed, he is not. I like him, so may I invite him?"

"No. Be good enough to obey me, Angela, and drop his acquaintance."

Her eyes flashed. "I shall not promise!"

"You will not? Then I shall send you away; it is getting too hot for your health. I have had a letter from Mrs. Carlyle: she offers us half her house on the Mall at Mussoorie; I can't go till September, but you had better go on Saturday. I can take you then."

"Oh, Frank, no! Let me stay with you! please do! I don't want to live with Mrs. Carlyle." She went up and laid her hand on his arm.

"Well, if you promise not to see that chap, Harford."

"Yes, yes! I promise, Frank, but don't send me to Mrs. Carlyle."

"All my friends are taken from me," she muttered. She moped and refused to eat. The long days were spent alone. She declined daily in health. One morning early the Ayah rushed into Fortescue's room to say "Mem Sahiba" was dying.

He found her in a faint.

He sent for the Civil Surgeon; when he arrived Angela was struggling back to consciousness; her husband was trying to make her drink some whisky.

She clenched her teeth and pushed the liquor away.

"Don't distress her," said Colonel Green; "she is getting well."

Divan Singh was waiting with a glass of warm milk, and handed it to the doctor.

"Yes, this will do as well," he said. Angela drank a little, and was soon able to sit up.

"She requires some kind of stimulant, I am sure," said Fortescue. "Some of your favorite champagne, that's the thing for you, Angela!"

She shook her head. "Please, Colonel Green, give me medicine, not wine!"

"Well, let us see what we can do." He thought a while, then said, "There's a tonic called 'Virona'; I hear well of it; would you like to try that? It is a medicine, but it is rather expensive," he said, turning to Fortescue.

"Never mind; my wife needs it, that's enough."

The "Virona" came. Three times a day Angela had recourse to her medicine. Very soon she felt she must take it five times. She slept a great part of the day and seemed always drowsy. Her face became flushed and swollen. Kathleen Scott, meeting her out driving, stared at her in astonishment; immediately she became suspicious, and called, but was denied. "Mem Sahib is not at home, by the Sahib's orders."

"Tell me, Divan Singh" (for it was he who came to her), she said impulsively to the servant, "is Mem Sahib taking wine?"

"No, Miss Sahiba, I watch very close, she takes no wine."

"I'm very glad. Is Mem Sahib well?"

"Mem Sahib is going to Mussoorie with the Sahib on Saturday."

"Indeed! I hope she will keep well. Please tell her so, and say I wish to say goodbye."

Dr. Kathleen Scott sat among the guests at a reception given by the landed gentry of the province to the Lieutenant-Governor who was paying his annual visit to Seraneb. Chandeliers of many colors lighted by oil lamps shed rainbow hues over the white scalloped imitation marble arches of the Palace. The gardens were illuminated by long, close rows of twinkling lights, outlining buildings, fences and trees. It was a dazzling show, and Dr. Scott felt almost as if she were in the dreamland of the Arabian Nights. There stood the tall figure of the Lieutenant-Governor garlanded with the huge tinsel "hars" of cleverly plaited gold braid; there were the hosts, the Indian nobles ablaze in brocade and jewels. The only modern elements were the English women in decollete gowns and the red-coated soldiers in attendance. The speeches were finished and there was a general move to the balcony outside to witness the show of fireworks.

A loud report—and then a roar of applause went up, as suddenly the gardens burst into view, one blaze of light! Roman candles and sulphur stars rose into the air; Catherine-wheels spun, dropping colored lights; fire fountains threw cascades of lambent sparks; fire balloons soared upwards, and all to the accompaniment of an endless popping of squibs.

Dr. Kathleen Scott had come with Colonel and Mrs. Green and stood with them on the terrace watching the show. She was conscious of a wondering kind of admiration at the governing Sahibs, who were entertained in this manner. Her life was somewhat restricted in amusement by the profession she had chosen. A figure approached, dark against the brilliant light. An Englishman in evening dress was making directly for her. He looked familiar. Yes, it was Mr. Harford; she felt very distinct pleasure in his greeting.

"How do you like this show?"

"Awfully; it is a walk into the Arabian Nights!"

"May I take you in to supper?"

"I have promised to go in with Colonel Green," She felt disappointment, as she would have preferred Harford's escort.

He stood chatting for a moment, and then passed on.

Tea, coffee and sandwiches were discussed in the verandahs of the Palace. Colonel Green did his duty and then left her, saying he had a patient he was bound to see.

"You will come home with my wife?"

Mrs. Green was not to be seen just then, so Dr. Scott moved off into the garden for a stroll.

Careful, as she thought, not to lose her way, she started to return, but soon found that she had strayed from the path by which she came.

Suddenly she found herself in a secluded spot, where stood a semi-circular summer house lit by swinging Japanese lanterns. Beneath it stood four people, three beautifully dressed women, and one man. The women, their white shoulders gleaming in the lamp-light, stood leaning in different postures towards the man. Each held a glass of sparkling wine in her hand, seemingly inviting him to drink. With a shock of surprise she recognized Harford. A laughing voice struck on her ears.

"You surely cannot refuse us all, Mr. Harford!"

Then another laid her hand on his shoulder and said with a seductive smile, "I ask as a favor that you drink my health."

Harford stood, looking in his faultless evening dress a typical well set up Englishman. His head was thrown back and the light from the overhead lanterns showed his face set in stern determination, the lips closed tightly, the eyes looking beyond, dully, indignant at this onslaught. He might have been carved in stone for the impression the fashionable women made on him.

Kathleen stood in the shadow; she knew those in the summer house could not see her. Accustomed to act in emergencies, she quickly made up her mind how, how to release Harford from his uncomfortable position. She cried out, "Mr. Harford, you are wanted, come at once!"

He started, glanced round, and then without a word began running in the direction of her voice. The women put down their glasses with a frown, and Kathleen heard one say, "The game is up."

She stood still behind the tree and as he passed her, said in a distinct low voice, "It was I who wanted you."

He peered into the shadow.

"You, Dr. Scott?"

"Yes, I saw your dilemma and took the liberty of calling."

"Ah, it is hard to be always in opposition," he said, "but I was in no danger, such scenes only confirm me in my obstinacy."

"Say rather, in your good resolution."

"I feel sure it was a got-up affair."

"Doubtless!"

They had been walking quickly, and had reached the Palace. The crowds were gradually thinning. "I am afraid Mrs. Green has given me up as a bad job," said Kathleen.

"Oh, may I see you home then?" said Harford, eagerly.

"I have my 'tumtum' here; yes, please drive me!"

"But there is no hurry, is there? It is only ten o'clock. Let us sit down and have a talk—here's a seat! I will tell you when the last departures are near." Kathleen wondered at herself for the joy this request gave her.

For ten minutes they talked on, sitting on the terrace in the shadow. He was very animated, and chatted freely to her of his work and his views of life, feeling the power of her womanly sympathy.

She jumped up. "Think of my patients; I must be gone!"

As they drove home, Harford said, "I'm really sorry for those poor women who wanted to make me drink; perhaps they had a bet on, and have lost it."

"I wish we could bring them to a better mind."

"There speaks the missionary!"

"Well, but could we not bring home to them in some way the fallacies of drink? No doubt they are very ignorant."

Can You Answer These Arguments?

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

1. Labor does not want prohibition.
2. Men in high office such as governors, mayors, bankers, etc., do not favor prohibition.
3. The Eighteenth Amendment was put over by a few fanatics.
4. Prohibition has increased crime, unemployment and made the cost of living higher.
5. The government's financial problems will be easily solved by taxes on wines and beers.
6. Prohibition does not prohibit. Intoxicants may be had any place.
7. No one wants the saloon back, but light wine and beer (with 4 per cent alcoholic content) will be all right.

Every one of these arguments and many others are undisputably and finally answered in THE UNION SIGNAL at different times. A year's subscription to the weekly edition will keep you prepared for any argument. Giving a copy to someone "on the fence" will help him to step off on the right side.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

NEW ELECTION BILL PLANNED IN HOUSE—MORE THAN TWENTY AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION SUGGESTED IN BILLS PENDING—POSTMASTERSHIPS GIVEN TO 1,000 WOMEN

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

New Election Bill Planned in House

The House Committee on Election of President, Vice President and Representatives in Congress, unanimously decided recently to proceed to the construction of a bill to limit the expenditures of candidates seeking nomination and election to Congress, and of a resolution to amend the Constitution.

The bill proposed to limit the individual Senatorial candidate in the primaries and elections combined to an expenditure of $10,000, and the individual Representative to $5,000. Personal expenses for traveling, stationery, stamps, telephone and telegraph service, under the provision of the bill, will not be included in these amounts.

This bill is intended to remedy a situation created by a decision handed down by the Supreme Court in the Newberry case, that under the Constitution Congress has not the authority to enact legislation limiting the expenditures of candidates. This ruling, which probably prevented Mr. Newberry's expulsion from the Senate, was later interpreted by the Attorney General as invalidating the provisions of the corrupt practices act of 1910.

Here are some of the provisions of the bill:

Must File Statement

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for election at any general or special election as Representative in Congress shall, not less than ten days or more than fifteen days before the nomination or election, file with the clerk of the House a full itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by any one for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid of his candidacy.

No candidate for Representative or Senator shall give or spend in procuring his nomination and election in excess of $5,000 and $10,000 respectively.

Each candidate for nomination or election shall file with the clerk of the House or Senate the aggregate amount expended in aid of his candidacy.

More Than Twenty Amendments to the Constitution Suggested in Bills Pending

Amending the Constitution of the United States is proposed by more than twenty resolutions introduced in the Sixty-seventh Congress, the latest being an amendment for the prohibition of child labor, following fast the decision of the United States Supreme Court, declaring unconstitutional the law placing a tax on the products of child labor in interstate commerce.

Representatives Perlman of New York and Fitzgerald of Ohio proposed amendments for employment of persons under 18 years of age—H. J. Res. 332 (Perlman); H. J. 327 (Fitzgerald). Representative Rogers of Massachusetts proposed an amendment relating to the employment of women and persons under 21.

Several amendments have been proposed as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case, invalidating the Federal Corrupt Practices Act—Willis, S. J. Res. 155, is one.

Friends of the District of Columbia have introduced an amendment to allow the District to have a representative in Congress—S. J. Res. 133 (Jones).

The ease with which divorces are obtained in some states and their increasing number have prompted an amendment to provide uniform divorce laws—S. J. Res. 31 (Jones).

Then there is a proposed amendment to provide for the nomination of Presidential candidates by direct vote of the people—H. J. Res. 50 (Schall).

Added to this are amendments to fix the term of members of the House at four years instead of two—H. J. Res. 220.

Also one to limit the President to one term of office and making this term six years.

Still another would limit the representation in the House to two members from each state—H. J. Res. 226.

An amendment proposes that taxes and apportionment be determined by vote cast in the Presidential election.

Another would fix the membership of the House at 500.

A vote by the people before declaring war would be required by one.

Another provides that a vote of the people in the states be required to amend the Federal Constitution instead of ratification by legislatures as now provided —H. J. Res. 12.

By another, legislatures of the states may give Governors power to make temporary appointments to fill vacancies in the House of Representatives. At present vacancies must be filled by special elections in states—H. J. Res. 252 (Appleby).

To these might be added proposals for Constitutional amendments prohibiting naturalization of persons, both of whose parents are not eligible for citizenship; compelling the listing of state securities in income tax returns by persons in states having no income tax; giving Congress the power to fix the terms of office of judges of inferior courts; giving the President power to veto items in appropriation bills; defining treason.

7,088 Appointees to Postmasterships Include 1,000 Women and 900 Veterans

More than one thousand women and nearly nine hundred former service men have been appointed postmasters of presidential offices, according to a report which has been submitted to President Harding by Acting Postmaster General Bartlett. Never before in the history of the postal system, it was explained, has such a large number of women been appointed to such offices.

From last March 4 to May 20 this year, 7,088 postmasters of presidential offices have been named by the President according to records of the Post Office department. There were 781 former soldiers who failed of appointment after securing places on eligible lists, the report indicated, showing that on many of the eligible lists there were two or three veterans.

"The President has always been interested in seeing that the women of the country were given every consideration in connection with the work of the postal system," Mr. Bartlett said, "and the reports concerning their work have been most satisfactory, a condition which highly pleased Mr. Harding."

No Future Sex Discrimination in New York Hall of Fame

It is reported that the separate hall for women in the Hall of Fame of New York University, containing the names of Frances E. Willard, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Mary Lyon, Emma Willard, Alice Freeman Palmer, Maria Mitchell and Charlotte Cushman, will be abandoned.

From now on the tablets of these noted women and others will mingle with those of famous men. This action is the result of a decision made at a meeting of the Senate of New York University, at which time an amendment making this provision was made in the constitution of the Hall.

Governor of Massachusetts Signs "State Volstead" Bill

It is reported that Governor Cox of Massachusetts recently signed the "state Volstead" bill, which would give state and local officials equal powers and responsibilities with Federal officers in the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Sale of Liquor Stopped in Philippines During Election

According to the Chicago Daily Tribune, unusual precautions were taken by Governor Leonard Wood to insure quiet during the recent general election in the Philippine Islands. The sale of liquor was ordered suspended the day previous to continue until all the votes were counted.

Iceland Forced by Spain to Suspend Prohibition Law

Both houses of the Iceland Parliament are reported to have adopted, with but one dissenting vote, the proposal of the Trade Committee that the government be authorized to suspend the prohibition laws for one year in order that wine containing upward of 21 per cent of alcohol may be imported and sold. If during the period of a year it is possible to find a new market for the fish of Iceland, the prohibition law will again go into operation. This information comes through the Swedish correspondent of the American Issue.

CHICAGO JUDGE CHALLENGES STATEMENTS IN A.P.A.'S "DEADLY PARALLEL"

National Association Opposed to Prohibition.
1608 Monroe Building, Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

Through the mail this morning, I received for the third time a letter written by your organization soliciting pledges to be used by you in an effort to bring about a modification of existing prohibition laws so that beer and light wine may be sold, etc.

I note the list of names printed on the back of your pledge, and I am very much amazed that so many reputable men in his community could be induced to lend heir support to the printed statement—The Deadly Parallel"—which you enlose in your letter. It seems to me hat it is the duty of someone to hallenge your statements, for they are alse in almost every particular, and where they are not false they are deiberately misleading.

I desire to call your attention to just few of the false and misleading statenents. In the first place, you say:

"It was promised that prohibition would save the boys and girls from inemperance, but juvenile delinquency is eported to have increased thirty-two per ent during the last year. The bootegger's bottle is leaving an inevitable nd indelible impression on the child ind," etc.

Juvenile delinquency has not increased hirty-two per cent during the last year, ut in Chicago, as well as in other cities overed by my investigation, I find that uvenile delinquency has very greatly dereased during the last year—and since he enactment of the prohibitory law. If ou want to know the facts concerning uvenile delinquency, consult the man vho is most familiar with them, Judge ictor Arnold, for many years the preiding judge of our juvenile court. I erewith enclose his statement on that ubject:

Judge Arnold's Statement

May 12, 1922.

Memorandum

Statistics of the probation department how the following regarding cases of lleged delinquent children brought into ourt over a period of years:

Alleged Delinquents	1916	1917	1918	1919	1920	1921
Boys..	2,191	2,328	2,306	2,647	1,912	1,754
Girls..	594	679	730	755	638	661
Total..	2,786	3,007	3,036	3,402	2,550	2,415

It will be noted that 1919 was the peak ear and that the decrease since that ime has been steady. In 1921, there vere less cases before the court than n any other year since 1913.

The first five months of 1922 show 525 oy's cases and 225 girls' cases, a total f 750, against 750 boys and 275 girls, a otal of 1,025, for a similar period of 921, a decrease of approximately twenty-ive per cent. (Boys' decrease thirty er cent; girls' decrease, eighteen per ent.)

You say prohibition promised from six-y to eighty per cent reduction in taxes ut that taxes have increased from one undred to three hundred per cent. gain you seek to deliberately mislead he public, for you know that the increase in the taxes has been due to the war and the consequent increase in the ost of living; that prohibition has had nothing to do with it.

You say it was promised "prohibition would reduce the population of the jails, poor houses, and insane asylums, but that after two years of prohibition the jails, poor houses, and insane asylums are filled to overflowing." This, too, is a complete perversion of the facts. Twenty per cent of the jails of the United States have been without prisoners since prohibition went into effect; and in eighty per cent of them the percentage of the number of prisoners has been reduced anywhere from fifteen to eighty per cent.

I have collected the prison statistics for the last seven years in several of the leading states, and everywhere the number of prisoners has been decreased since prohibition.

In New York, the total number of prisoners in 1915 was 6,939; 1916, 6,685; 1917, 5,356; 1918, 5,264; 1919, 4,903; 1920, 4,783; 1921, 5,129.

In Indiana, total number convicted and imprisoned in county jails; 1914, 18,130; 1915, 14,644; 1918, 4,641; 1919, 3,555; 1920, 2,192; 1921, 3,596.

In all prisons: 1914, 19,207; 1915, 17,380; 1918, 6,745; 1919, 5,609; 1920, 3,991; 1921, 6,597.

In Massachusetts, prisoners in all prisons: 1915, 6,663; 1918, 3,701; 1919, 2,896; 1920, 2,352; 1921, 3,252.

Total arrests for drunkenness in Massachusetts: 1917, 129,455; 1920, 37,160; 1921, 59,585.

In Wisconsin, total prison population: 1917, 1,299; 1919, 998; 1921, 957.

Population Chicago Bridewell, January 1, each year: 1917, 1,818; 1918, 1,888; 1919, 1,214; 1920, 717; 1921, 1,087.

In California, total in state prison: 1917, 3,631; 1920, 2,898.

I have not found a single state or a single prison where there was not a marked decrease in the prison population in 1919 and 1920. In most of the states there was an increase in 1921 over the year 1920, but with that increase the prison population is still from twenty per cent to twenty-five per cent less than it was before the war.

From the last year before the prohibitory act went into effect to the first year following its enactment, the population of the Chicago Bridewell decreased over fifty per cent.

During the year previous to the enactment of the prohibitory law, 169 persons died in the hospital at the Bridewell from alcoholism. Last year one person died in the same hospital of the same cause.

The records of our insane asylums in Illinois, as well as elsewhere, show a marked decrease in the number of inmates during the last three years. The greatest cause of insanity was the use of alcoholic liquor.

You say prohibition promised a reduction in the cases in our criminal courts but that since the act went into effect there has been an alarming increase in the major offenses—largely inspired by growing disrespect and disregard for the law, etc. Here, again, your statement is utterly false. In every large city of the United States there has been a decrease in crime since prohibition went into effect. In some cities it has amounted to sixty per cent: I have before me the records of all of the larger cities of the United States obtained since the first of January, 1922.

In 1918, the last year before prohibition went into effect, 94,000 persons were arrested in Philadelphia for crimes. In 1920, the first whole year after its enactment, 73,015 persons were arrested for crimes. In speaking of crimes, I mean the major crimes: murder, robbery, and burglary, as well as the lesser crimes. The reduction was as marked in the major crimes as in the less serious. If you want the figures, I shall be glad to furnish them to you, covering at least twenty-five of the leading cities of America. Here are a few of them. I can furnish you the number of arrests for murder, robbery, burglary, and manslaughter; also total arrests in each of these cities.

In 1917 in Chicago there were 129,270 arrests for crime. In 1920 there were 87,197.

In 1918 in San Francisco there were 49,647 arrests for crime. In 1919 there were 26,673.

In 1918 in Cincinnati there were 22,883 arrests for crime. In 1920 there were 15,944.

In 1918 in Buffalo there were 35,902 arrests for crime. In 1920 there were 24,436.

In 1918 in Baltimore there were 62,076 arrests for crime. In 1920 there were 41,998.

In 1918 in New Orleans there were 23,239 arrests for crime. In 1920 there were 15,079.

This is a record of but few of the many cities from which I have collected the figures.

Far more significant have been the arrests for drunkenness. You have deliberately tried to make it appear that there is more drunkenness in America today than there was before the enactment of the prohibition law. You must know that such is not the fact. From all the cities covered by my investigation I find that, from the last year prior to the enactment of the prohibition law to the first whole year following such enactment, there was a reduction of arrests for drunkenness of over two hundred per cent in the United States.

We are not able to give exact figures in Chicago on this matter because of our method of keeping statistics, but from daily holding court, I am sure we have had less than fifty per cent as many in Chicago since the law as we did before its enactment. Our criminal business in the municipal court has so fallen off on account of prohibition that we have abandoned two courts that have existed since the court was created, and instead of having from ten to twenty drunks in the bull pen now on a morning we have less than one-half as many.

* * * * * * *

The showing made by the larger cities is more than equaled by the smaller cities throughout the country. I have also collected the data from many of these. It is fair to say that the reduction in the total number of arrests for intoxication in the United States since the enactment of the prohibitory law runs over 700,000 persons annually.

You say that prohibition promised a more general regard for the law but that never before has the law been so cheaply held among all people as now. There

A PEEP INTO KOREA

BURDEN-BEARING IN THE HERMIT KINGDOM — INTERMINGLING OF THE OLD AND THE NEW — THE MAKING OF VOWS — VAST RETURNS FOR MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE

Christine I. Tinling

China New Year has come round again and since schools are closed for several weeks, I have paid a short visit to some of the educational institutions of Korea for there they do not give more than one day's holiday at the New Year season.

In this interesting little country we breathe from the first the spirit of the mountains. We never get away from them, neither would we wish to do so. While not lofty, being for the most part hardly more than two thousand feet in height, they are sufficiently rugged to be picturesque, and in the clear atmosphere they stand forth in crisp outline, tinged with delicate hues.

They occupy about three-fourths of the area of Korea, while the little towns nestle here and there in the valleys below. So the Koreans are a race of mountaineers, with the intense love for country and for liberty which is always characteristic of those who live within the shadow of the hills.

Their houses are usually but one story high and are thickly roofed with thatch, though some are covered with the rounded tiles one sees in China. There is something very peaceful about a picture of thatched roofs; and the sense of peace is enhanced by the beast of burden that one sees in the quiet streets, the slow and patient ox. More often than not, he is carrying pine branches for sale as fuel, packed in neat bundles and fastened to the wooden rack he wears. His white-turbaned master walks ahead, leading him by a rope.

To the new-comer the inhabitants resemble ghosts, for they dress for the most part in white, the men wearing full length gowns like the Chinese, but unlike them having long streamers of the goods, tied in a bow on the right side. The women in some places go about with immense white aprons thrown over the head and coming down over the full white dress. When snow covers the landscape, as it does at present, and the white figures are seen flitting about in their white world the effect is somewhat weird.

The children, however, add a touch of brightness to the scene, for they are dressed in all the colors of the rainbow and more striking shades than the rainbow ever shows. There are several colors on each child, chosen at random, without any restraining regard for aesthetic considerations.

Korean Styles

The old-fashioned Korean is known by his top-knot as the old-fashioned Chinese is recognized by his queue. To keep this excrescence in place, at right angles to his scalp, he wears a black band, which fits tightly round his forehead and is covered by a cap, trimmed with fur, reaching down over the neck. Perched on top of all is the horsehair hat, in shape something like that of the Pilgrim Fathers, but of open, transparent mesh and very light. It weighs slightly more than an ounce. Mourners wear a special hat in the form of a large straw basket in which the face is to some extent hidden from view.

The Korean enjoys his bamboo pipe, which is about two feet long and very slender. When a boy becomes engaged to be married he adopts a short pipe, only used by those who have just made "the world-without-end bargain," and also a small white hat which he claps on one side of his head. After marriage he exchanges this for the black one.

One of the distinctive figures in the Korean streets is the man with a rack on his back, known as his "jiggy". This wooden appliance is strapped to the shoulders and upon it the coolie will carry boxes and bundles piled high above his head, or perhaps a traveler's heavy baggage, which at home would demand an express wagon. He leans forward so that the weight is supported by his hips and in this way he can manage two or three hundred pounds. There is surely a knack about burden-bearing, and it is a knack worth knowing whatever one's load may be. Perhaps after all, the whole secret lies in first of all donning that rack or frame, which to the uninitiated seems a burden in itself, but which is in reality the lightener of all burdens. Was not the Master referring to some such illustration from higher physics when he said, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of Me, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

A Glimpse at Korean Celebrations

When I reached Seoul at Chinese New Year the streets were bright with people in holiday array. The gowns were so white that they fairly glistened and the crowds of children in their riot of color reminded one of an old-fashioned flower garden. The men folk were taking their little boys and girls to "bow" to their grand-parents and other relatives. The women stay at home for the first three days of the year, preparing food for these visitors, who must partake of something at every place. Only too often they start out in the morning, intelligent and self-possessed, to return at night stupid and tipsy, as a result of taking just a little here and a little there of the native drink, known as "sool".

It was surprising to see the children from the poorer homes emerging in these bright new suits. The explanation was that the Koreans use the plain white muslin and color it at home with vegetable dyes. Then they have a way of dressing it which gives a gloss, so that to the casual observer it resembles silk. The dear little Korean children are perfectly bewitching as they prance about the streets in their New Year's clothes.

I had the welcome opportunity of attending a Korean feast at this auspicious time. We had the fare proper to the occasion, namely, dumplings of rice flour, filled with meat chopped fine and mixed with bean sprouts. Then there was the bowl of vermicelli, a standby here, as it is in China. The most characteristic article on the menu was "kim-chi," preserved cabbage, something like sauerkraut, strong of smell and hot to the taste. A little of this goes a long way, but no one is really initiated into Korean society who does not learn to eat it.

Needless to say, the drinks at this Christian feast were of the temperance brand. There were two, honey-rice and persimmon-juice. The former was too sweet to be palatable but the latter was rather good. The dried persimmons are soaked in water and then cooked for a short time, a few cloves are added and a good deal of cinnamon, and when chilled, the beverage is ready.

As the Mountains Are Round About Jerusalem

Seoul, the capital of Korea, is said to be one of the most beautifully placed cities in the world. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so are the round about Seoul. Formerly a wall encircled it, winding up and down over the mountains. Most of it has now been destroyed, but the bit that is left standing on the steep slope is noble and picturesque. The city is being rapidly foreignized. There are electric street cars, a few automobiles and a considerable number of foreign buildings, in addition to the excellent mission premises.

On the Sunday after my arrival I spoke at the men's meeting held regularly every week at the Y. M. C. A. There must have been about a thousand present, for the hall comfortably seats eight hundred and there were crowds standing both upstairs and down. They were from a large extent students from the Law and Medical schools.

There is a tremendous enthusiasm for education in Korea. It seems to have grown out of the Independence Movement. While that was purely a passive resistance effort and did not appear to have any practical outcome, it led to a general intellectual awakening. The attendance at government schools has increased forty-five per cent in the past two years, while in mission schools the gain has been eighty-seven per cent. Korea must realize that in order to serve their country they must first be educated.

Speaking to Korean Women

The women's meeting which was held on the following Sunday was in some respects a contrast to that of the men, for it was so much more distinctively Korean. We met in the pleasant "Evangelistic Center" where the churches do a fine union work for the women of the city. They sat cross-legged on the floor and looked quite happy and comfortable, though, to tell the truth, one would rather see them do it than to do it oneself.

The floor was warm, according to Korean custom. It is made of flat stones so arranged that there are flues or passages between them, connected with the kitchen fire. The hot air winds its way up and down these flues, evenly warming the room and passing out by the chimney at the farther end. Over the flag-stones is a special kind of mud and this again is covered with oiled paper. Then the neat matting is laid down and people sit at their ease and keep their feet warm while the weather is zero outside. With all our "witty inventions" in the western world, we are not necessarily superior in every detail. Other people's way of doing things sometimes answers the purpose just as well as ours.

Protestant mission work in Korea is carried on for the most part by the Methodists and Presbyterians, working in splendid harmony. There are a few English missionaries and the Salvation Army has work in some half a dozen centers, but the country as a whole is divided up among the Northern and Southern Methodists and four brands of Presbyterians, including the Canadian and Australian varieties. The mission stations, judging from those I have seen, are finely equipped as regards buildings but they need more workers.

There is a good deal of union effort in the peninsula. While in Seoul I stayed in the Union Women's Bible School, beautifully situated on the outskirts of the city. Miss Hortense Tinsley of that institution planned my trip in Korea and spared no pains to make it a success. To save time and strength she arranged for the Bible School students to unite with city preachers and teachers in a series of evening meetings. One afternoon her Korean secretary copied our set of temperance charts, putting them into the national script. Korea has reason to be proud that she has a phonetic system by which a person can learn to read in a few days. It has been in use for several hundred years. The educated formerly despised it and read only the Chinese character, but it opened the door of knowledge to the masses and made it possible for the ignorant to read the Word of God in their own tongue and now its value is generally recognized.

Modern Conveniences vs. Ancient Custom

While the Union Women's Bible School is an up-to-date institution and is fitted with such modern conveniences as steam heat and electric light, the students are encouraged to do their every day work much as they would do it at home. For there they will return and it would be a pity were they unable effectively to do domestic duties with the implements within reach. One evening we watched them ironing. The Korean girl folds up the garment into a fairly small compass, places it on a stool and kneels down before it. Then taking in each hand a stick resembling an Indian club, she pounds it to smoothness. Afterwards, still further to improve its appearance, she spreads it open and passes over it a sort of frying pan full of hot coals. This seems a risky proceeding but much practice has made her skilful and she seldom burns her clothes.

In the early days of the Korean mission, Henry G. Appenzeller opened in the capital a school for boys which was in fact the first modern school in the country. The emperor became interested in his effort for the education of his people and conferred on the institution the name "Pai-chai Hak-tang," or "Hall for the Training of Useful Men." Hundreds of boys have here been prepared to render faithful service to God and their fellows. The missionary founder lost his life in a ship-wreck twenty years ago, but his son stands in his place today as principal of Pai-chai, and is filled with a burning zeal to bring young Koreans to Christ.

After I had been speaking to the boys several successive mornings, about alcohol and tobacco, Mr. Appenzeller suggested that we should close our meeting by a presentation of the pledge. In China I do not as a rule do this, for it is rather the part of the organizer, who offers it in connection with the enrollment of members. But, needless to say, I was more than willing. A special Pai-chai Pledge was drawn up, stating that the undersigned students gave their word of honor that they would refrain from alcohol and tobacco until they were twenty-five. The thought was that most boys who can keep a pledge through those ten or twelve perilous years, will by the end of that time have formed a life-habit of total abstinence.

Being somewhat afraid of action taken by a group, without strong individual conviction, I did not press the boys to sign. On the contrary, I gave them as a final word, the solemn warning from the book of Ecclesiastes, "If thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay." Even after this, two hundred and ninety-four boys affixed their names to the school pledge and fifteen of their Korean teachers took the same stand. One of these came up afterwards to the missionary and said, "Give me something to do. I want to be used." So we may hope that he will assist in perpetuating this movement.

"Quicksilver" of the "Pear Flower School"

Close to Pai-chai is a school for girls, the first ever opened in Korea. The Emperor patronized this one also, presenting it with an official sign-board and conferring on it the name of "E-wa Hak-tang" or "The Pear Flower School." Today it has a strong faculty of American missionaries and the influence of E-wa is felt through the length and breadth of the land. In my daily addresses there I was interpreted by one of the brightest of the Korean girls. We lost no time, for she could grasp the thought and speak the word with astonishing rapidity. If I were asked to name her I should call her "Quicksilver". There was much earnest purpose among the E-wa girls, making it a privilege to talk to them about service for home and country.

Then there was a flying visit to the College among the pines. Some say it has the best site of any college in the Far East. It was opened as a union institution in 1914. The last two years there have been twice as many applicants for admission as the college could accommodate. Some have walked two or three hundred miles to take the competitive entrance examination. Several of the graduates have now gone to America for further study; others are teaching on the spot. Facing that fine student body in their elegant new building, one could not fail to realize that things are moving very fast in this little country, which not so many years ago was known as the "Hermit Land."

"Ko mop sim nai da!"

Besides these, I had the privilege of meeting with another very interesting group of men, or rather two groups in one, the students of the Theological Seminary and the Men's Bible School. Many of them were so anxious to gather information on the subject of alcohol and tobacco, that they attended the evening meetings for preachers and teachers as well as their own morning class. The president of the Theological Seminary is Dr. Hardie, who was so largely used of God in connection with the great Korean revival, the memory of which will be fresh in many minds. He is most anxious that his graduates should be well qualified to do temperance work and his strong and helpful influence must be a great power in their lives.

These men took me completely by surprise on our last day by the presentation of a beautiful little silver brazier. It corresponds to our chafing dish. In the middle of the bowl there is a small cylinder, in which one puts the charcoal and around this is placed the food to be cooked, while the cover which completes it is prettily engraved. Being so characteristic of Korea it has quite a special value, and will always be a reminder of that fine group of Christian workers. Missionaries say Koreans are peculiarly responsive and grateful and have such thoughtful and beautiful ways of expressing appreciation of anything that is done for them. I was glad on this occasion that I happened to have learned the Korean for "Thank You," "Ko mop sim nai da"!

Modern Life in An Ancient Capital

The journey from Seoul to Song Do was short. It is a conservative city and in its sleepy streets one feels that at last one has found the real old Korea. It was formerly the capital and nearby may be seen the ruins of the Emperor's palace, whose spacious halls and massive granite pillars stood out against the mountain back-ground before ever Columbus started on his immortal voyage. While that imposing edifice has passed away, and only the granite steps and great foundation-stones remain to tell the tale of vanished glory, other buildings of deeper import have sprung up along the slopes of Song Do.

The mission plant of the Southern Methodist Church is one of the finest to be found anywhere, and that same native granite has been utilized in its erection, with the result that beauty and strength characterize the group of mission buildings. Here again are splendid schools both for boys and girls, alike an inspiring sight at chapel time. The precious opportunity of an education is also offered to young married women, until recently cut off from the fount of knowledge, and their building stands on the very spot where once there were two shrines for the worship of devils.

Interest in the W.C.T.U. in Cuba Revived by Work of Mrs. Florence Atkins—Strong National W.C.T.U. Executive Elected

"The coming of a repreeutative of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to Cuba at this time is most opportune," a citizen of that country told Mrs. Florence E. Atkins, a National W. C. T. U. organizer and lecturer, on her recent visit to the neighboring island. "The people are ready for your message."

The marvelous success of her tour of the country has demonstrated the truth of this statement. It had been the intention of the National W. C. T. U. president, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, to include Cuba in her trip to Mexico and the Bahamas, but quarantiue regulations then prevailing prevented her landing at Havana. However, while her ship was in the harbor of that city, she had a conference with citizens interested in our work and with them studied the situation, becoming convinced of the advisability of having a W. C. T. U. representative spend some time on the island, reviving and creating new interest in the work of the organization.

Mrs. Florence E. Atkins was chosen for the important mission and her reports, and those from temperance leaders in Cuba, are most gratifying. The newly elected national president writes that as a result of the work done, local unions have been organized, the National W. C. T. U. of Cuba reorganized, officers elected, plans made for an executive committee meeting once a month before the open meeting, seven yearly copies of THE UNION SIGNAL taken, and that there is a good prospect for possibly three delegates being sent to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in Philadelphia.

The national officers are: President, Mrs. E. J. Simonds; vice-president, Miss M. E. Craig; corresponding secretary, Mrs. R. L. Whitehead; treasurer, Mrs. Taylor. The organizer is Mrs. Alberta Rodriguez, wife of a Cuban pastor.

"The most wonderful co-operation and sympathy of the missionaries," writes Mrs. Atkins, "made it possible for me to reach the people with our message. I was talking one day with the pastor of a prominent church and said I wished very much I could get to some of the outlying places but feared it would be impossible because of the high railroad fare and terrific hotel bills. He suggested, 'I am not sure I can do anything, but I know the railway officials pretty well and will make an effort to get you half-fare rates.' A few days later he presented me with a letter authorizing all agents to sell me tickets at half price. This enabled me to go to Matanzas, a city of 50,000 inhabitants, with Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist missions, but no English-speaking people outside of the schools. The Baptist preacher happened to be on the train, and when he saw me at the Matanzas station, trying to make a hack man understand that I wanted to go to a hotel, he stepped up and said, 'I wonder if this is Mrs. Atkins?' When I replied in the affirmative, he insisted that I go home with him and meet his wife, and for three days I was most delightfully cared for in their hospitable domicile, and found both of them most enthusiastic champions of temperance. I spoke three nights, and on the last one, the preachers also made strong addresses. We organized with 120 members, forty of them young people of the Methodist School. A man on the outside started an opposition meeting but he could not hold his crowd; they simply flocked to us. The preachers implored me not to leave Cuba until I had visited all the towns. From Matanzas I went to Cardanes, where the Presbyterians have the largest Protestant school on the island. I was entertained by Dr. and Mrs. Wharton, and spoke to his congregation one evening, fifty people signing for the organization of a W. C. T. U. He and Mrs. Wharton, and several others, promised me that they would call a meeting of all the churches for the purpose. I spoke also to his high school students, and 150 of them pledged themselves to total abstinence. Dr. Wharton is superintendent of all the Presbyterian schools on the island and has promised to put scientific temperance instruction in all of them."

Considering the statement heard frequently by Mrs. Atkins when she first reached Cuba, that "Almost everybody here drinks," the encouragement she received is remarkable. Not ouly did the enemy hold meetings outside the door of places where she was speaking but she was caricatured in a Cuban political paper. She was told by one of the prominent citizens of Havana that there had just been organized a new political party, known as the Republican party, one of the chief planks of whose platform is the eradication of all legalized evils and vices from the island, including, she was told, the liquor traffic.

The most hopeful sign that prohibition sentiment will increase is the promise made to Mrs. Atkins by educators everywhere to arrange for the teaching of the truths of science concerning alcohol, and the interest being awakened among the children and young people, whom Mrs. Atkins taught to sing, "Cuba's going dry, Cuba's going dry, pass along the watchword, Cuba's going dry."

Address by W.C.T.U. Speaker at Sofia, Bulgaria, Results in Speedy Organization

"By advertising a lecture on 'A Present-Day Problem' I gathered a nucleus of women to whom I told something of the result of national prohibition in the United States of America; of the part the Woman's Christian Temperance Union had played in bringing it about; of the organization of the World's W. C. T. U. and its program for world-wide prohibition," writes Mrs. Elizabeth C. Clark of Sofia, Bulgaria. "The meeting resulted in speedy organization, with a large executive committee having in mind energetic action in various directions. Easter for every one, and for some of us the annual meeting of the Bulgarian Evangelical Society in a city twelve hours away by train and carriage, made it impossible to have another meeting here, but the time has not been wasted. The day before the beginning of the B. E. S. meeting has for years been devoted to the annual meeting of the Temperance Union of our churches. Mrs. Furnadjieff (our pastor's wife) and I were chosen to be the speakers at the evening session when the little church was packed with representative men and women from many different places. We had already been chosen to serve on the executive committee of the union. In spite of a very full five days' program, we succeeded in getting in a talk of a half-hour or more, and impressed upon the women the need of action, each in her own circle, to make it possible for God to answer the prayer of womanhood the world over for world-wide prohibition. At the close of the meeting, a young boy came to ask me, in the name of the temperance society in their gymnasium, to remain over another day and talk to them, but that I could not do. Mrs. Furnadjieff, however stayed several days longer and lectured twice (once on temperance) far more effectively than I could have done, and to large audiences. I brought back the names of several who have promised to do what they can at home. Realizing that knowledge is indispensable to e

National W.C.T.U. Representative Given Royal Reception in South Africa—Mrs. Deborah Livingston's Messages Influence Public Opinion

Glowing reports are being receive from Miss Emilie Solomon, president the South Africa W. C. T. U., of th reception accorded Mrs. Deborah Kno Livingston, who reached Capetow April 17. Miss Solomon writes, "We ca never thank the National W. C. T. U. the United States sufficiently for sparin Mrs. Livingston to us. Our only regr is that she cannot extend her visit fo at least one month longer. She ha made a fine impression upon the variou audiences she has addressed."

On April 18, Mrs. Livingston was give a reception by the Woman's Christia Temperance Union, the Woman's Enfra chisement League and the W. C. C. Cathedral Hall, Capetown, the hostesse on the occasion being Miss Solomon an Lady de Villiers, president of the Wom an's Enfranchisement League. In th evening she addressed a large gatherin of young people, Mrs. Duncan Brow "Y" secretary for South Africa, presi ing. On the following afternoon sh spoke to the staff and students of th Cape Town Training College, and i the evening to the students of the Cap Town University. Earlier in the day sh was received by the Superintenden General of Education, who evince cordial interest in the work of the W C. T. U.

The next day she was the guest at luncheon given by Captain and Mr Blackwell at the House of Represent tives, and there had the pleasure of mee ing General and Mrs. Smuts and membe of Parliament. Later she was entertaine at tea to meet General Hertzog and son of the Nationalist leaders. In the ev ning she spoke to a large company colored and native people, under th auspices of the Colored W. C. T. U.

A very large audience gathered at th City Hall to hear her story of "Proh bition in the United States," and th message was received with tumultuou and continuous applause.

On Sunday morning Mrs. Livingsto filled the pulpit of the Wesleyan Metr politan Church and in the evening spok at the Congregational Church at Se Point. Monday, on invitation, she a dressed the members of the Girls' St dent Association of Stellenbosch Un versity, giving an address to the st dent body in the evening.

"Mrs. Livingston's week in Capetow has amounted to a series of ovations writes an official of the South Africa Temperance Alliance. "There is n doubt she has influenced public opinio by her addresses." The press of th city gave extended and appreciative r ports of her speeches, and the anti-alco hol movement has been given a marke impetus by her visit.

Workers in other parts of South Afric are eagerly awaiting her coming an anticipating increased interest amon the people as the result.

FACTS ABOUT THE COMING WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION EVERYBODY SHOULD KNOW

THE NEXT WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENtion is to be held in "The City of Brotherly Love", Philadelphia, November 11-16, 1922.

THE CONVENTION WILL HOLD ITS MEETings in the historic Academy of Music, not far from the famous Independence Hall where the Declaration of Independence was signed, and where is to be seen the Liberty Bell.

THE OFFICERS OF THE WORLD'S W.C.T.U. will be among the speakers at the Convention. Because of the death of Rosalind, Countess of Carlisle, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, vice-president, will preside. Other officers who will participate are the honorary secretaries, Miss Agnes E. Slack, England, and Mrs. Blanche R. Johnston, Canada; and the honorary treasurer, Mrs. Ella A. Boole.

DELEGATES AND VISITORS from a score of countries will be present to tell of the condition and progress of the anti-alcohol movement in foreign lands. Among them will be Hardynia K. Norville and Muriel Ayres from South America; Baroness de Laveleye from Belgium; Mary Campbell, world's organizer, and others from India; Mrs. F. K. Singiser, former president of Burma; Mrs. F. S. Hayman from Egypt; Mrs. W. H. Carvosso from Australia, Miss Maria Stenroth from Finland; Uta Hayashi, noted educator of Japan; Consuela Valdez from the Philippines, and many others.

SPECIAL W.C.T.U. AMBASSADORS, who, since the last World's Convention, have visited other countries to help in educational and legislative campaigns, will tell thrilling stories of their campaigns. Miss Anna A. Gordon will tell of her trip to Mexico and the Bahamas, Mrs. Deborah K. Livingston, of South Africa; Mrs. Florence E. Atkins, of Cuba; Mrs. Lydia Johnson, of Sweden; Mrs. Eva C. Wheeler, of New Zealand; Mrs. Emma Howland, of Scotland; and other workers of lands they have visited.

CONFERENCES FOR THE DISCUSSION of departmental work will be held during the convention. Exhibits will show spectacularly what is being done by the W.C.T.U. of different countries.

OPPORTUNITY WILL BE AFFORDED to delegates to take side trips to Washington and New York, as well as visit all the many interesting places in Philadelphia and environs.

SPECIAL RAILROAD RATES are to be secured and will soon be announced. Delegates will plan to attend not only the National W.C.T.U. Convention, which will immediately follow the World's gathering, but also that of the World League Against Alcoholism meeting in Toronto, Canada, November 24-29.

World's W.C.T.U. Convention Headquarters

The Bellevue-Stratford, Broad and Walnut streets, Philadelphia, is located in the center of the city, convenient to the leading stores, theaters, and railroads, and will be the headquarters of the World's W. C. T. U. Executive Committee and as many delegates and visitors as can be accommodated. Personal application must be made direct to the hotel. Rates are quoted as follows:

Single rooms without bath, $4 and $6 per day. (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person.)

Single rooms with bath $5 and $6 per day (inside). (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person.)

Single rooms with bath, outside, $7 to $9 per day.

Double room and bath (with outlook), $9 to $11 per day.

Room with twin beds and bath (open court), $8 and $9 per day.

Large double room with twin beds and bath, $10 to $13 per day.

Two rooms and intervening bath on open court (two persons), $9 per day. (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person in room.)

Two outside rooms with intervening bath (two persons), $13 per day. (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person in room.)

Begin without delay to make your plans to attend this great meeting, and become acquainted with your comrades from South America, Europe, Asia, Africa and the islands of the Sea!

Reserved Seats For World's Convention

As previously announced, the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. has engaged the Academy of Music in Philadelphia for the World's Convention.

This historic building has a seating capacity of about 3,600.

Seats for the regular delegates will be reserved (without charge) in the parquet.

In order that visitors may be assured of seats, reservations will be sold, beginning with the publication of this notice. All applications, accompanied by price of seat, will be recorded in the order in which they are received by the undersigned, and selection of seats made upon that basis.

On account of a state law which prohibits any sale of tickets for Sunday, reservations will not cover that day, but will include the afternoon and evening meetings on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, November 13, 14 and 15.

All morning meetings, as well as those on Saturday, November 11, will be held in the audience room of the Bellevue-Stratford hotel, for which no reservations are sold.

Receipts will be issued for all payments and a careful record kept of sales. To prevent possible loss, the reserved seat ticket will not be delivered until claimed in Philadelphia, on or after November 7.

Reservations may be transferred upon written order of the purchaser.

Boxes are of different sizes, seating from four to six persons.

Checks should be made payable to the undersigned.

Prices per each seat are as follows:

Your Attention Is Called—

One of the encouraging signs of the present day is the use being made of church bulletins to arouse in Christian people a keener sense of civic responsibility. The writer read with satisfaction, on a recent Sunday morning, in the bulletin of her church, the following words:

"Your attention is called to the fact that tomorrow from six a. m. to four p. m. the polls will be open..... You are urged not to neglect to vote. Only through the neglect of the voters can a victory be snatched from us."

A similar appeal on every church bulletin in the United States the Sunday previous to primary and election days would without doubt greatly reduce the number of American citizens—27,000,000 or more—who fail to recognize their obligation to use their franchise privileges to defeat the efforts of corrupt politicians and promote good government.

Is your church bulletin doing its part in the "wake 'em up" movement?

Mrs. Asquith Admits She May Have Been Mistaken

The admission of Mrs. Margot Asquith, wife of a former premier of Great Britain, is commended to the critics of prohibition in this country. She accepted without investigation or attempt to learn the truth, statements made to her that prohibition in the United States is an absolute failure, that anywhere and at any time one could get all one wanted to drink, and that conditions under the Eighteenth Amendment were far worse than before the law went into operation. Since leaving this country she has received information from people who know whereof they speak, and whose statements cannot be questioned, and she admits, as quoted in the Boston Transcript of May 23, under a London date line: "Perhaps it was unwise for me to write at all upon prohibition, as during my stay I saw only 'particular kinds' of people in the great cosmopolitan cities of the United States, who did not represent more than a small stratum of the great community. I understand since I wrote that I have been wrong and that though there has been a great deal of drink concealed and consumed, it is infinitely less than before prohibition."

There is no lack of facts easily obtainable to prove that prohibition is a most remarkable success considering the handicaps it has had. Let honest critics correct their false and prejudiced views by studying these facts. There can be no question as to the result. They will be convinced of the value of prohibition and the desirability of its enforcement.

A Warning to Voters

Under date of May 8, the New York Tribune acknowledges—perhaps the first of the New York morning papers to do so—that to so far modify the Volstead Act as to authorize traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes "is a repeal of the amendment by mere act of Congress, something which is unconstitutional."

It then delivers the following warning: "It behooves prohibitionists, therefore, if they would save their reform, to see to it that they do not lose control of both houses of Congress at the same time."

This warning may not be needed, but in this connection it may be well to remember that 200 organizers of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, meeting on May 11 at the Pennsylvania Hotel, New York City, adopted the following principles to guide them in the coming elections, as reported the next day by the New York Sun:

"(a) If both candidates are wet, follow your own party.

"(b) If one is wet and one dry, vote wet, regardless of party.

"(c) If both are dry, put up a wet one."

Each person present agreed to make an effort to obtain ten new members in the city, before the next primaries. Someone suggested that many more members could be gotten if the dues were fifty cents instead of a dollar, and immediately two people offered $50.00 each, to pay the other fifty cents for two hundred new members.

There are many encouraging signs in the prohibition field, and it is, perhaps, one of the most significant factors in the whole situation that everywhere the hydra-headed monster, alcohol, is raising its many heads in a life-and-death struggle for a victory. It is the wounded and starving, rather than the full-fed, satisfied beast of prey which makes such a struggle, but it may be most dangerous at just such a time. Can we do better than deliver another blow by following the tactics so clearly outlined by the enemy, and

If both candidates are dry, follow our own party;

If one is wet and one is dry, vote dry, regardless of party;

If both are wet, put up a dry one.

Sir Arthur Doesn't Miss His Wine!

One may not agree with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle in his ideas regarding communication with the Great Beyond, but he puts to shame many American-born citizens when he declares, "I have been accustomed to wine all my life, but I am in America now and can't get it, and I have rather lost my appetite for it." His statement evidences a higher regard for the Eighteenth Amendment to our Constitution than is shown by many men of prominence who make no effort to "lose their appetite" for a beverage that has been outlawed by the government to which they profess allegiance.

In sending money to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to THE UNION SIGNAL, or the National W. C. T. U. NATIONAL W.C.T.U. REPRESENTED AT SUMMER GATHERINGS

MANY ATTRACTIONS AT CHAUTAUQUA, NEW YORK

National W. C. T. U. headquarters at Chautauqua, New York, opens June 20. The season will be especially interesting, for the biennial convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs is to be held June 21-30. During June, Mrs. C. P. Lindsay, national superintendent of Exhibits and Fairs, is to be the W. C. T. U. hostess, and is to present an exhibit demonstrating National W. C. T. U. activities along lines parallel with departments and divisions in the General Federation program. National directors or superintendents of the departments of Press and Publications, Legislation, Education, Citizenship and Public Welfare will co-operate with Mrs. Lindsay in the exhibit.

During the summer school season, Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary, will be in charge as hostess. An unusually interesting program under the auspices of the National W. C. T. U. is planned. Speakers and dates will be announced later.

The speaker for W. C. T. U. day on the Chautauqua program this year is to be Dr. Valeria H. Parker, national W. C. T. U. director of the department of Social Morality and executive secretary of the U. S. Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board.

Religious conferences—home and foreign mission weeks—will be held August 12-29. The hostess at W. C. T. U. headquarters will be announced later.

International Sunday School Convention

The International Sunday School Convention meets, June 21-28, in Kansas City, Mo. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be represented by Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, World's and National superintendent of the department of Sunday School Work. Mrs. Irvine is installing an exhibit that will suggest ideas calculated to promote the effort of the W. C. T. U. to have temperance, patriotism and Christian citizenship teaching included in the curriculum of the Daily and Vacation Bible Schools and community training schools. Mrs. Irvine's associates in the exhibit booth will be Miss Annie E. Monroe of Carthage, Mo., state W. C. T. U. superintendent of Sunday School Work, and Mrs. G. F. Davis, of Kansas City, Mo., Federated City W. C. T. U. superintendent.

Social Workers' Conference

The National Conference of Social Work is to be held June 22-29 at Providence, Rhode Island. The National W. C. T. U. will be represented at this meeting by Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national W. C. T. U. director of Americanization, and Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national W. C. T. U. director of Child Welfare.

National Education Association Meeting

Miss Cora F. Stoddard, national W. C. T. U. director of the department of Scientific Investigation, will represent the National W. C. T. U. at the National Education Association convention, to be held in Boston, July 3-8, and will install and have charge of an educational exhibit in connection therewith.

A program of unusual interest is to be given at this meeting. Among the advertised speakers are General John J. Pershing, Hon. Calvin Coolidge, vice-president of the United States, P. P. Claxton, former commissioner of Education, and educators of note. Conferences for special discussion of such subjects as Child Hygiene, Immigrant Education, Rural Education will be of interest to W. C. T. U. workers.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out his roots by the river, and shall not fear when heat cometh, but his leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit. (Jeremiah) 17: 7, 8.

thusiasm and energetic action, I want to aid them to keep informed. I have been taking THE UNION SIGNAL and find it so helpful that I am subscribing for another copy to pass on to those who know English. When we three members of the executive committee of the union, who live here in Sofia, hold our first meeting I shall move that we order more literature and print something in Bulgarian for general distribution. As yet, the larger part of our charter members belong to the Orthodox Church, and I hope they will continue to outnumber us, even though we succeed in interesting every woman in our Protestant communities in Sofia. We have made a beginning. I am sure our white ribbon comrades in America will pray that it may not prove to be only that."

Anti-Prohibition Speaker Follows W.C.T.U. Worker in Sweden

"For six weeks I have talked to overflowing audiences every day—sometimes making two or three speeches a day in the darkest part of Sweden," writes Mrs. Lydia B. Johnson, who is doing some special campaign work in Sweden, as the representative of the National W. C. T. U. of the United States. "Sometimes the audiences are hostile but they are mostly appreciative. The liquor forces have called their most eloquent speaker, a Prof. Lundstedt, from the university at Upsala, to counteract the influence of my lecture. His meeting was held across the street from ours. We had 1,000 people in the auditorium of the high school. He had 300 in the City Hall. Every W. C. T. U. and untold pastors and laymen have asked me to express to the national W. C. T. U. of the United States their appreciative thanks for sending me to help in the campaign. To speak on behalf of the American W. C. T. U., with a message of service and love, lends a dignity to the work which appeals even to the hostile press, so that honest and courteous reports of lectures are published."

World's W.C.T.U. Notes

Miss Maria Stenroth, traveling secretary of the W. C. T. U. of Finland, and an author of note, is in the United States speaking among her own people for temperance and social betterment. She hopes to remain in this country for the World's W. C. T. U. convention.

At the annual council of the British Women's Temperance Association recently held, Lady Cecilia Roberts, daughter of the Countess of Carlisle, was elected president to succeed her distinguished mother. The council sends to the white ribboners of the United States a message of congratulation on the great success which has followed the two years of prohibition.

A letter recently received from Mrs. George Smart, president of the W. C. T. U. of the Madeira Islands, says. "There is talk of prohibition in the Islands. We hope it may crystallize." The Islands are a dependency of Portugal and an appeal has been made by citizens of Madeira to the government to prohibit the traffic in drink, as a health measure.

Song Dedicated to National W. C.T.U. Musical Director

"It is There to Stay," an Eighteenth Amendment song, the latest production of J. G. Dailey, is dedicated to Mrs. Frances W. Graham, song leader for many years of the National W. C. T. U., whose sweet, cheering voice has sent the songs for God and Home and Native land ringing round the world. Mr. Dailey is well known for his stirring musical compositions, the most famous being "A Saloonless Nation in 1920."

The last verse of the new Eighteenth Amendment song reads:

"By a Royal Act of Congress backed by states in strong array,
By the Court's Supreme Decision, signed and sealed in legal way,
By Jehovah's Ultimatum, which the people MUST obey, ...
It is in the Constitution, and it's there to stay."

W.C.T.U. Picture Wins Enthusiastic Applause

Carolyn E. Rens, State Superintendent Medal Contest Department

The Central W. C. T. U. of the St. Louis Federation received great and merited applause from the vast audience which crowded the Pershing Theater when the Woman's Chamber of Commerce presented an evening's entertainment. Each club in the Chamber portrayed, by living picture, its particular work. The new sticker issued for the World's W. C. T. U. Convention was our model, represented by Miss Fanita Bohne, dressed in flowing white, a silken American flag across her breast and on her head a golden crown lettered "W. C. T. U." Standing on a large pedestal, holding aloft a globe twenty-four inches in diameter, our band and bow of white around it, she made a beautiful picture. Before the curtains were drawn aside, the attention of the beholders was secured by the singing by Mrs. Harry Symonds, a talented soloist, of the first two lines of "All round the world the ribbon white is twined." Then, with the spotlight turned on, the first verse and chorus were sung. The tremendous applause caused a second showing, the chorus only being used. This picture was said to be one of the best, if not the very best, of all that were shown.

Texas W.C.T.U. Convention Stresses Law Enforcement

Josephine Collins

A good attendance of delegates and visitors made the fortieth annual convention of the Texas W. C. T. U., held at the state capital, Austin, an unusually interesting meeting. Mrs. J. B. Chatfield, former state president of Alabama, was an honored guest.

Reports from all departmental superintendents showed greater progress all over the state.

The welcome banquet, at Austin's chief hostelry, was well attended, and we were honored by Governor Pat M. Neff with an inspiring address on law enforcement.

The visits to Texas this year of our national president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, and four of the national directors, have done much to encourage the women of our state. One of Texas' requirements for the voting privilege in the state executive, a subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL, did much to "whoop her up" on SIGNAL subscriptions. This rule is to be rigidly enforced.

A feature of special interest was the film, "Safeguarding the Nation," which shows the effects of alcohol on our national life. This was kindly loaned to us by the Rev. Atticus Webb, Texas' Anti-Saloon League superintendent.

Our newly elected state president, Mrs. Claude de Van Watts, is of old Quaker stock, a consecrated Christian of charming personality, and, withal a forceful speaker, well informed on public questions of the day. Mrs. J. B. Ammerman, the beloved vice-president for many years, was unanimously re-elected. The other officers are Mrs. C. R. Porter, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Fred Lawson, recording secretary, and Mrs. May Manifold Kirkham, treasurer. Mrs. Josephine Collins was re-elected editor of the state paper.

The time of holding convention was changed from spring to fall, which will, for this year, necessitate a convention within a six months' period. The main work for the summer will be stressing the raising of the budget, and law enforcement. Each woman present at the convention was earnestly urged to go home and organize her women into a Law Enforcement League, and to see that no moonshiner, or bootlegger, goes unwhipped of justice.

Lamoille county (Vermont) W. C. T. U. convention, held at Wolcott, was of interest to all who attended. The program consisted of routine business, reports, music, readings and addresses by the state president, Mrs. Elsie Pease Barney.

The main address was by her upon the theme, "Our Supreme Task," and was heartily received by the audience. After school hours she also addressed a large body of children, who were accompanied by their teachers.

Resolutions were adopted pledging efforts to sustain the Volstead Act, support law enforcement, and uphold Mr. Hays in censoring the movie picture films.

The "budget system," which has been adopted by the state, is being heartily endorsed by the county.

The officers and superintendents were nearly all re-elected to office. Many reported good work done during the past year.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life.

MRS. EMMA McCLELLAN of Oakland, California, at the age of 82 years. For over forty years a member of the W. C. T. U., for twenty years active in the San Jose union, and a pioneer in suffrage work, she will be greatly missed by all who were privileged to know her.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Episodes in the Life of An Organizer

Necia E. Buck, North Dakota Y. P. B. Secretary

It was nearing the holiday season when the organizer visited the little town of C—, which then supported a W. C. T. U. and an L. T. L. of seventy members each. The prospects seemed good for a Young People's Branch. The women were not sure that the young people would be interested, but they had in their union one who would make an ideal leader—a woman who delighted to work with young folks and who inspired their love. She was willing to undertake the task and arrangements were made for the union to have, after the holidays, a social evening for the young people (something every union should do occasionally), the organizer to return and see what could be done. It so happened that the night she had planned to be in C—, a basket-ball game had been scheduled, but, nothing daunted, the women announced that after the game there would be a light repast. The organizer presented the work very briefly, and while refreshments were being served three women circulated the pledge and secured the names of nineteen girls and eleven boys. The organization was completed, and five names have since been added. Meetings are held regularly and much interest is evinced.

As is her custom wherever she goes, the organizer, when at P—, presented the Y. P. B. work in the high school. She also held a public meeting in the evening, at the close of which the superintendent of schools said he had been planning to organize for the young people, believed the Y. P. B. would suit his purpose exactly, and invited the organizer to come to the school the next day and see if she could interest the students. The result was an organization of twenty-four members—twelve boys and twelve girls—with the superintendent as leader and his principal as assistant.

The evening had been a disappointment. The crowd was small, the interest not strong enough to make a union possible. But the teachers were there, and after the meeting the superintendent, his wife, and the organizer remained for a time, discussing the situation. After a while two of the teachers came back and offered to escort the organizer to her hotel. On the way one of them said in a hesitant manner: "Mrs. B., we came back to see if we cannot organize an L. T. L. in the school even if there is no W. C. T. U. organization?" "Bless you, yes," was the reply, and back they went to interview the superintendent, who was pleased to arrange for an opportunity to organize before train time the following day. At the hotel plans were discussed till a late hour, and the result was that three of the teachers became members of the W. C. T. U., their names being forwarded to the local union in their respective home towns. Three local women became Willard members and agreed to help the teachers. Eighty-one pupils signed the company rules as members of the L. T. L.

Essentials for a Model Meeting

Percy Dunn, President New York Y. P. B.

There are Five P's essential for the success of a meeting: 1. Personnel. 2. Program. 3. Purpose. 4. Pleasure. 5. Pep.

The Personnel of a meeting includes not only the officers who are presupposed to be present at every meeting, but all the members as well. It means superintendents of different departments, chosen on account of their suitability for the work over which they have charge. Of course, the general secretary should help constitute the personnel of every meeting as a chaperon, not as a leader. In addition to the members, every meeting should have as visitors all the young people of the community; get them interested, prove the Y. P. B. a success, and in all probability they will soon join. As special guests at the meeting, invite two or three members of the W. C. T. U. They will enjoy it and it is a splendid way for the mother organization to keep in touch with the young people and also a beautiful way for the Y. P. B. to express its loyalty, a sort of mother and daughter party at every meeting.

The Program naturally divides itself into three parts: (a) business meeting, (b) topic for discussion and (c) social hour. For the business meeting follow the "Order of Meeting" in Year Book for 1922. For the discussion period the "Topical Programs" in the Year Book, offer numerous suggestions. After the program is ended, don't wait for impromptu suggestions for games, etc., but have the recreation in charge of some person or committee, who will make it a real part of the evening; many a new member may be won by a successful social hour.

Under Purpose and Pleasure, remember our slogan, "A good time with a purpose" and through all the meeting there should be Pep-Pep-Pep!

Chicago Judge Challenges Statements in "Deadly Parallel"

is no truth to this statement. Never before were our American citizens as clean and law-abiding as they are today. We have much crime in America but four-fifths of it emanates directly from the saloons that are still running in violation of the law, and from the illicit sale of liquor. If your people would put forth as much effort trying to uphold and enforce the law as you do in trying to destroy it, we would have less crime.

I notice that printed on your pledge you say: "Beer, light wines, no saloons." At least prohibition has had some effect upon your committee who now desire to go upon record as being opposed to the saloons. I have no recollection of ever hearing of any of your committee taking that position before. At least you are following in some degree the enlightened sentiment of the world.

Yours very truly,
WILLIAM N. GEMMILL.

The boys' school is indissolubly linked with the name of Baron Yun Chi Ho. After graduating from Vanderbilt he deposited a sum of money with Dr. Candler to be used at some future time as a nucleus for a school in Korea. Later, when it had been started in a small way in Song Do, he himself took charge of it, teaching in a rough ginseng shed, which was all that could be afforded at the time. To him the privilege of service was incomparably more precious than worldly comfort or official position. From this small beginning the school has grown to be a fine institution with almost one thousand students, of whom two hundred and ninety are in the High School.

One of its chief features is the textile department which turns out a very serviceable cotton cloth in attractive and durable colors. In China we often hear missionaries sing the praises of this Korean material, which never fades, so they say, and seldom wears out. In fact we have had ocular demonstration that the color is practically unchanged after five years of washing. So it was the more interesting to visit the plant, where Japanese cotton is treated with German dyes and woven by American machinery into a first-class Korean product. About fifty boys are able to receive an education by working part-time in the textile department and it so happens that they are at present all Christian lads, so the opportunity thus afforded them will doubtless issue in blessing for their country.

It was my privilege to teach scientific temperance in all of these schools, reaching boys, girls and married women. The Y. M. C. A. in the High School clinched the matter by preparing a pledge in the Korean script, mimeographing it themselves and presenting it through their president to the assembled boys. Two hundred and thirty students signed it. Freely translated it says: "I promise never to use wine or tobacco and I will also work against these things." Afterwards they lined up before their beautiful building, each with the pledge-slip in his hand, and had their picture taken, a fine band of young patriots, prepared to fight and conquer one of their country's fiercest foes.

Law Enforcement in America Will Have Effect in Korea

The Koreans are very much interested in our struggle against the enemy in America. The papers, both English and Japanese, contain the usual "arguments" against prohibition, and the oft-repeated statements that it is a gigantic failure. Faithful work for law-enforcement at home will give an impetus to the cause of righteousness over here. Truly the world is one and we cannot help our own land without being of service to others far away. Our lives are not so little as they look!

Korea offers wonderful opportunities to young Christians who have a life to invest. Perhaps no missionary enterprise has ever shown such vast returns. The first Korean convert was baptized in 1886 and now there are 86,000 communicants and a Sunday School enrollment of 215,000. As many as fifty thousand days of preaching have been freely subscribed in one year by the church members.

Yet there still remains very much land to be possessed and many more messengers will be needed before the gospel can be fully preached to the sixteen millions of this peninsula. Short though my visit was, and spent in a few large centers, I saw something of heathenism in its lowest form, that of devil-worship. We were taking a ramble along a country road when our attention was arrested by the sound of drum and cymbal, coming from a group of houses not far away. On going to the spot we learned that a sorceress was there, offering a propitiatory sacrifice to the devils as a preventive against disease and disaster. My missionary friends requested permission to pass into the court-yard of the dwelling where the assembly was being held and to our surprise it was freely given.

Those within the house, on hearing voices (albeit the voices of foreigners) pushed back the sliding paper doors and came forward. The sorceress, cymbal in hand, spoke kindly to us, and the women who had crowded in the low room to pray to the devil now gathered with smiling faces to greet the representatives of Christ. One felt that if the missionaries had more time to give to these villagers, they might perhaps be led out of their awful darkness into God's marvellous light. But these gospel messengers are so few and so over-worked! Who knows when they will be able to go again?

As we left, the women returned to their fearful ceremony. We saw the sorceress place outside the door four brass bowls heaped with rice, after praying to the evil spirits to leave them in peace for this present year. Then she took her large straw scoop and put into it, from each bowl, her own handful of rice, her rightful due as priestess. Thus did she go shares with Satan. Is not such a scene in itself a call to proclaim to these benighted ones the glorious gospel of the blessed God?

"Give us a watchword for the hour,
A thrilling word, a word of power,
A battle-cry, a flaming breath,
That calls to conquest or to death,
A word to rouse the Church from rest
To heed her Master's high behest!
The call is given; ye hosts arise,
Our watch-word is 'Evangelize'!

"The glad evangel now proclaim
Through all the earth in Jesus' name,
This word is ringing through the skies,
'Evangelize! evangelize!'
To dying men, a fallen race,
Make known the gift of gospel grace;
The world which now in darkness lies
'Evangelize, evangelize!'"

The prohibition director says the cost of enforcing the prohibition law is paid by the fines imposed for breaking it. Then, we presume, if those who are opposed to the law would not break it there would be no means of enforcing it and they would win their contention, making the law a dead letter and everybody would be satisfied.

Prohibition in the United States

Professor Gaupp, teacher of psychiatry at the University of Tübingen, appeals in the Munchener Medizinische Wochenschrift (Munich) to the German people to consider the progress in public health and private prosperity which has already followed prohibition in the United States. [An editorial in the same issue endorses his statements, saying that far too little attention has been paid in Germany to "this most important step which a people ever took to promote health and morals."] Professor Gaupp concludes his historical sketch of prohibition with the statement that the only way to ever reach the goal is by training the young to a life without alcohol as a matter of course. He adds, as quoted by The Journal of the American Medical Association, "In Germany, from 18 to 20 thousand millions were spent in 1921 on spirituous beverages; the alcohol morbidity is increasing every month; wines and liqueurs are being imported freely, and French brandy by the carload." . . . "The Germans have to import thousands of millions worth of grain for food while large areas are given over to the cultivation of raw material for the distillers and brewers. Potatoes, grain and fruits, needed for food, are given to the liquor manufacturers, and more have to be imported at the ruinous rate of exchange." He cites notices posted by the authorities informing the postoffice and state railroad employes that they are entitled to buy brandy from the state reserves. At the Gumbinnen station the notice adds, "The brandy is of good quality, costing in the storage warehouse 38.45 marks per liter." Professor Gaupp visited America three times before the war, and he appreciates the difficulty in enforcing prohibition at present, but anticipates that when the existing supplies of liquor are exhausted the task will be easier. He comments on the fact that the physicians of the United States "were by no means the leaders in the fight against alcohol—an experience which agrees with that in other countries."

From the Standpoint of a Conductor

J. Cleve Dean, a well-known conductor on the Southern Railway, does not approve of the action of the American Federation of Labor in going on record for the repeal of the Volstead Act, and in a recent letter to the Chattanooga News, while frankly admitting that there was a time when he used to "turn green in the face" on meeting a prohibitionist, and that he has learned that "it isn't what he likes that does him the most good every time," but frequently what he does without that benefits him the most, he sets forth his personal views on the drink question, as follows:

"Some time ago the press carried a headline reading, 'The American Federation of Labor at its convention goes on record for the repeal of the Volstead Act.' Never before have the leaders of this branch of organized labor made such a broad mistake, and I regret to see those big headlines standing before the eyes of the public as a witness against labor.

"If drinking liquor were legal and decent, then the employers of our country would never object to employing the rankest kind of a 'booze head,' and if it were right for a man to soak his hide with booze, the railroads of our land would eliminate rule G.

"If it were right for a man to drink liquor, then a boy's mother, instead of sinking down in tears when he comes home 'stewed,' would run to meet him, shouting his praises.

"If it were right for a man to partake of strong drink, then instead of a wife meeting her intoxicated husband with the rolling pin I am quite sure she'd have a brass band to greet him so as to do him honor. But it isn't right for any man to indulge in strong drink, because it shortens his life, it lowers his morale, it places him on the lowest plane of life, it causes his friends to lose faith in him, it causes him to lose faith in himself; it is Satan's best friend and God's vilest enemy."

Recalls Old Days

"I remember a few years back when payday came around in railroad centers and mining towns, the city would always put on an extra force of policemen to keep order; but now we don't have such trying times.

"I have seen the time when Chattanooga was 'wide open,' and when a passenger crew left town on Saturday evening they had to put on their 'fighting clothes' in order to handle the drunks. I have seen the time when it was nothing unusual to have a dozen drunks in the ladies' car falling and staggering around over women and children. And now we don't have any such conduct, and I hope I'll never live to see such days return.

"I want to say right here that I don't believe the 'big four' brotherhoods will ever make the statement which the American Federation of Labor has just made. It has been their aim all the time to weed out the booze heads from their ranks and I believe they have made pretty good progress along these lines.....

"While the leaders of the A. F. of L. have made this mistake, I don't believe they have truly spoken the sentiment of their members as a whole, and let us hope that moral pressure will be brought to bear against them in a way that will compel them to radically change their attitude toward the Volstead Act."

A Few Facts from Seattle's Juvenile Court Records

Mary E. Brown

In looking over the Seattle Juvenile Court report recently, the following attracted the attention of the writer:

The state prohibition law became effective in Washington January 1, 1916. During 1914, one in every fifty children in the county of school census age, which practically parallels the court's jurisdiction, was cared for by the court. In 1918, even though the population had greatly increased and the war was in progress, only one in every one hundred and twenty-one, was brought to court.

In 1915, there were four hundred and seventy-five children who required protection because of parental neglect: during 1918, there were two hundred and seven in this neglected group, and last year three hundred and forty-eight. (The increase last year is attributed to industrial conditions.)

The report states that "this improvement is due to temperance legislation and the favorable industrial conditions."

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. At a small dinner she meets Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb. He encourages her to resist the appetite which has been held in check during her mother's visit, but it is roused by the fermented wine at communion, and only the refusal of Divan Singh to let her have liquor keeps her from being again overcome. Bertram Harford, hurt by a servant he had dismissed, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them. The doctor finds Angela ill and depressed, and at her request asks Fortescue to help his wife to resist her craving for liquor. Instead, he dismisses the doctor, and sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle. Meanwhile, Dr. Scott and Harford are becoming better acquainted.)

CHAPTER XIX

Far removed from the friends who were not only willing but anxious to act as props to her weak will, Angela very quickly went down before the assaults of the enemy. She set up "Virona" as a staff to lean on. Was it not a highly-recommended tonic ordered by the doctor because she refused to take wine? The poor girl did not recognize that the "Virona" she trusted in, was a strongly alcoholized wine masquerading under the name of a medicine! The chemist who supplied it found Mrs. Fortescue a little mine of wealth to him, for had she not to prop her failing powers with repeated doses, ever growing larger and more frequent?

Mrs. Carlyle induced her to enter into the gaieties of Mussoorie. Calls, "at homes," theatrical entertainments, dances, in constant succession, exhausted her. She habitually overdid her strength by the help of the false stimulant she employed. Her mind could never be said to be clear. She lived in a state of confusion. Her mental powers, never very strong, seemed to retire, her conversation became monosyllabic. But she was beautiful, and dressed well, and was kind and gentle; that was enough for the people whom she met. Her position as a Deputy-Commissioner's wife opened the door to desirable society, but Mrs. Carlyle took care that she should be amused only by her own coterie of friends. Very soon the offers of whisky pegs, at first vehemently rejected, were accepted as a matter of course.

The rains continued very late into September; for some weeks thunderstorms prevailed.

Towards the middle of October, Mrs. Carlyle, who had to go down shortly, leaving Angela in possession for the month of November, when the expected event was to take place, invited Angela to go with her to a tea party. Angela consented, but she was in such a confused condition that she was hardly conscious of her surroundings. The tea had resolved itself into whisky pegs and cigarets on the verandah. Angela sat watching the rolling clouds which were gathering black and lowering.

"There will be a thunder-storm directly; let us go in!" said Mrs. Carlyle.

Angela started to her feet. "I will go home at once."

"No, no! stay till it is over," her friends urged. But she persisted. "I must go home; I am not well."

They put her into her rickshaw. The coolies rushed her up the Mall at a great speed. The equilibrium of the rickshaw was often difficult to maintain: Angela heeded it not. But she was sobered when a terrific peal of thunder rent the air. The clouds opened and shut, revealing veins of fiery fluid. Not a drop of rain came as yet, but the evergreen oaks groaned and twisted in the whirl of the violent wind. The thunder grumbled, growled, echoing reverberations among the great mountains, until the noise became one long, continuous roar. The blue fire of the lightning went leaping, racing round the rickshaw.

Angela imagined her end was come. Her drink muddled brain saw terrors greater than existed. Her men were struggling, pushing, pulling the rickshaw up the rocky, precipitous path which led to the bungalow, when suddenly what seemed a conflagration enveloped them and simultaneously came a terrific crash. Angela fainted. Then the rain came down in a blinding sheet almost sweeping the coolies off their feet. They pushed their burden on, in the descending torrent, drenched to the skin, and at last reached the porch. Their mistress lay back quiet, the rain pouring upon her unconscious face.

Alarmed, they cried, "Bearer! bearer! Ayah! Ayah!" in stentorian voices.

The servants came and between them lifted Angela out and carried her to her bed. The Ayah, in a fright, suggested the Doctor, and a servant was sent for Major Melcombe, the Civil Surgeon. The messenger returned with the tidings that "Doctor Sahib bahar gaya" (the Doctor has gone out).

"Fetch another," ordered the Ayah; "I saw Miss Scott Doctor Sahiba yesterday: fetch her."

Off again, and in half-an-hour's time Dr. Scott, who had a week before come up to the hills for a much needed rest, was in attendance. She looked critically at the patient, who was now recovering consciousness, and lay gasping and moaning.

"We must get her into bed at once," said Kathleen to the Ayah. "Who is th Mem Sahib's Doctor?"

"The Doctor Sahib is Civil Surgeor but he is out," Ayah replied.

"I will not leave till he comes; sen again to him."

Between them they took off her ric dress and made the suffering girl con fortable. She did not recognize Dr. Scot Next morning at five o'clock a child wa born to Angela, a puny boy who scarcel lived. The mother barely escaped wit her life. For a month Angela lay in be a prey to fever and delirium. Her ca puzzled Major Melcombe. He would fi her one day with a temperature real normal: the next there would be fev and wandering. He tried several me cines, but with little effect.

One morning he noticed that the nur did not meet him at the door as usu but kept her seat by the bed, seeming in a kind of stupor.

As he spoke she got on to her fe and began to talk in a thick, incohere way. Immediately a suspicion arose his mind. "She has been drinking." caught her by the arm and led her the door, pushed her outside, and sa harshly, "You are drunk!" She was able to answer. He returned to Ange and gazed down at her. In a flash ca to him the cause of the patient's fe and delirium. Now he was keenly al to her symptoms. Angela was in a se conscious state. He examined her ey then called for Ayah, who came in w the whining baby.

"Go at once and call Mrs. Carlyle; tell her the Doctor wishes to see her."

Mrs. Carlyle, at Fortescue's request, had remained to watch over Angela in her protracted illness.

The Ayah jingled off and returned with the lady.

"I have discovered that the nurse drinks. Did you know that she had this detestable habit?"

Mrs. Carlyle colored under her rouge. "Well, Doctor, I knew she took a little."

"And you knew she gave it to the patient?"

"Yes, in small doses; but you ordered a teaspoonful of brandy, three times a day!"

He started, and gazed inquiringly at the bed. "She has had more like three pints a day, I should say. Mrs. Fortescue is in an exceedingly critical condition. Send away that nurse at once, telegraph to her husband, and then be kind enough to call on Dr. Kathleen Scott. She is exceedingly clever, knows the patient, and I wish to put her in charge. I have worked with Dr. Scott, and know her capabilities, so you may rest in peace all will be done that is possible."

Dr. Kathleen came, but refused to take charge of the case until Mr. Fortescue had been consulted. "He dimissed me from attendance on his wife. You can scarcely expect me to undertake the case."

"But as my assistant!" urged Major Melcombe. "I'm over head and ears in work, owing to this epidemic of influenza, and if anyone can pull her through, you can."

"Telegraph that to Mr. Fortescue, then."

He went obediently. In four hours came the answer, "Save her by any means, and by Dr. Scott's help, if she will be good enough to undertake the case."

As they bent together over Angela, Dr. Scott whispered to the doctor, "She has been drugged with alcohol."

"I fear so; she must be strictly watched that no one gets to her."

"I shall remain in this house on condition that Mrs. Carlyle leaves; I cannot trust her."

"I will suggest that she is not wanted. She is anxious to get away, and will go like a bird."

It was as Major Melcome said. Mrs. Carlyle was tired of the hills in the dull season; nothing was going on, and she departed the next day, glad to leave Angela in someone's care.

"Mrs. Fortescue, do you know me?"

"Yes, it is Dr. Kathleen Scott; but where is nurse?"

"Gone; I am your nurse and doctor now!"

"May I have my medicine; I feel so sinking?"

"Yes, drink this warm milk."

Angela's face fell, disappointment looked out of her eyes. Dr. Kathleen thought, "Now is the time to watch her." She said aloud, "Drink this milk; it will give you strength to see your husband."

"Is he coming?" Then with a glad look she said, "Ah! he has not seen baby; he will be so glad that he is a boy. Doctor, does he get on? I have not seen him for a long time—days, I think."

"He is fairly well, and over a month old. If you take this nourishment, and do not excite yourself, you shall have him, when he wakes."

Angela obeyed, and watched Dr. Kathleen moving quietly about the room. She soon became drowsy, and the doctor, getting up from a letter she had been writing, discovered her patient asleep.

She called the Ayah, who was nursing the sleeping baby. "Come here, and sit by your mistress while I go out. If she wakes give her the baby. On no account let her take anything while I am away. I shall soon be back."

"Very good, Miss Doctor Sahiba."

Dr. Kathleen had to arrange to give up her own rooms and remain with Angela for some time. She was but half an hour away, and hurried back to her charge.

As she opened the bedroom door, a sight met her eyes! Angela was on her knees before the "almira" (wardrobe), evidently searching for something. The Ayah, with the baby in her arms, crying feebly, stood over her mistress, expostulating, "Mem Sahib, Mem Sahib! do not! do not!"

"What are you doing, Mrs. Fortescue?" Dr. Kathleen asked.

"I want my stimulant, my medicine; it is in here, in a bottle under my dresses! I cannot live without it!"

Dr. Kathleen caught her arm as she drew the whisky bottle out. Taking it from Angela, she carried it to the window and threw it far out, but the smell of alcohol arose strongly and filled the room.

Angela threw herself on the floor, crying, "Cruel! cruel! it's all gone!"

Dr. Kathleen lifted her in her strong arms and placed her in bed.

"Now, Mrs. Fortescue, take your little baby in your arms. That's right! Now do you want to get well, or would you rather die and leave him?"

"Poor little pet, I want to be well to take care of him, of course," she said, kissing the little face which she held somewhat awkwardly against her shoulder.

"Then you must give up the stuff you call 'medicine'; it is a deadly poison, and you are already suffering from heart trouble in consequence of indulgence in it. Do you hear?"

Angela was crying weakly.

Dr. Kathleen laid her hand on Angela's head kindly, but firmly, and looking into her eyes, said, "Promise me to give it up at once, and for ever!"

Angela looked at her with miserable, appealing eyes. "Yes, but it is torture without it."

"That will pass. But I cannot save you, unless you bring your own will to bear. You must will to give it up."

"But——"

"There are no buts! Think! You are a mother now. You owe a duty to this child." The baby cried, and Angela looked at it almost with fear.

"Poor little fellow, he wants his mother!" said Dr. Scott.

"Wants me?"

"Yes, you. Ayah! bring his bottle and Mem Sahib will feed him."

Angela, with awkward movements, did her best to attend to the baby's wants, but she was soon tired, and lay back with a look of exhaustion. He was sent away, and Dr. Kathleen sat quietly talking to her about baby and his future, with the wish to distract Angela from her own feelings and desires.

The Challenge Light

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

"THE UNION SIGNAL Challenge Light, a beautiful silver lamp, symbolic of the enlightenment obtained through reading the official organ of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, will be awarded at the Atlantic City convention, to the state sending in the largest number of new subscriptions between November 1, 1921, and October 31, 1922." Thus reads the announcement made six months ago. The plan entitles the winning state to have possession of this lamp for use at state and national conventions, conferences, banquets, etc., and to keep it until some champion state wrests it from her. Even then the honor will be recorded by the engraving of the name of the winner upon the lamp.

Now that half the prescribed time has passed we are printing a list of the states that have sent in over 300 new subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL during this period:

New York	1124
Pennsylvania	896
Illinois	646
Iowa	630
Indiana	585
Wisconsin	546
Kansas	535
Ohio	443
Massachusetts	436
New Jersey	414
Minnesota	410
California (North)	325
Florida	322
Missouri	304

It is interesting to note how near Pennsylvania comes to the leader, New York. Illinois and Iowa, with a difference of only 16 subscriptions, have just cause to be proud of their record. Notice Indiana, Wisconsin, and Kansas, in a "neck to neck" race!

How easy it will be for Pennsylvania to get ahead of New York—that is, if New York will only quit work for a time—take a little vacation.

It is evident that no state at this time can be sure of winning the lamp. There are six months longer in which to work. Yield not to the thought that because such and such a state has the largest population, large cities, large membership, etc., it must win. The percentage list recently published shows that the state having the largest membership does not always have the greatest number of subscribers. Kansas and Wisconsin with a membership several thousand less than some other states are forging right ahead. Verily, the spirit quickeneth!

A Wonderful Offer

A COMPLETE RADIO OUTFIT will be awarded to the person sending in the largest number of yearly subscriptions—over 200—to THE YOUNG CRUSADER, between June 15, 1922, and September 15, 1922, at the regular price of 35 cents each. No other premium allowed.

Mark subscriptions plainly "Radio Award".

Another Briton's Opinion About Prohibition

"It is cheering to note that now and then an observing, fair-minded Englishman comes to the United States, makes a real study of prohibition and returns with a true report to British newspapers and audiences," says the Spokane (Wash.) Spokesman-Review of May 14. "Hugh Lewis, general manage of the Liverpool and London and Glob Insurance company, an institution tha does a large business in the Unite States, has returned to England after stay in the United States of sever months last fall and winter. The Birk enhead and Cheshire Advertiser Birkenhead, England, reports an addres given by Mr. Lewis on prohibition i America. He kept his eyes and ears ope during his long stay in this country, an presented fairly to his audience all th principal arguments advanced by adv cates and opponents, as well as h own observations.

"His own conclusion is that th American people are satisfied with pr hibition and the law will never be r pealed.

"It is almost impossible for the Bri ish people to get the truth about pr hibition in America. Rowdies break u prohibition meetings or even resort physical violence against speakers f the prohibition cause. The powerful di tillery and brewery interests hire me and women from the United States make speeches abounding in misrepr sentations and untruths. English me and women of a certain type come ov here on a brief tour of observation, cc fine their studies to a few big cities a often to association with a fast set boozing proclivities, and then flit ba to Britain with a horrifying story abc the failure of prohibition and the t mendous uprising of opposition sen ment.

"Mr. Lewis made his own quiet, p sistent investigation, and carried t truth back to England. Eventually t truth will get a fuller hearing ov there, and eventually Great Brita will come to prohibition."

THE whole world revolves about the child. In the child's tiny fingers, head and heart, lies the weal or woe of the future. He is a bank developing in strength and power with the advancing years of his childhood. What is drawn from that bank in the years that are to come depends upon what is deposited there while he is still a child. We cannot deposit carelessness, neglect and indifference, and expect in later years dividends of knowledge, integrity and righteousness.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

ONLY 50 OUT OF 435 CONGRESSMEN ATTACH NAMES TO WINE AND BEER PETITION—RESULTS OF CONGRESSIONAL PRIMARIES ENCOURAGING—NATION READY TO CO-OPERATE FOR WORLD PEACE—PRESIDENT TO SUBMIT TO CONGRESS VIEWS ON CHILD LABOR LEGISLATION—SOCIAL HYGIENE BOARD BILL NEEDS SUPPORT—LEGAL STATUS OF LIQUOR ON SHIPS DEFINED

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Only 50 of the 435 Congressmen Attach Their Names to Wine and Beer Petition

The petition presented to the Ways and Means Committee of the House asking for a report on the 2.75 per cent beer bill, H. R. 11410, sponsored by Representative Hill of Maryland, had but 50 names out of the 435 Congressmen. The names with states are given here for the study of our readers. Please note that on the petition there are only two names of Congressmen living west of St. Louis, one Congressman from Rhode Island, one from Michigan, three from New Jersey, and several from New York. Old Kentucky makes no black spot on this map for wine and beer. The other signers are from the cities of Milwaukee, St. Louis, Boston, Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, San Francisco, and New Orleans. Here are the names:

John Philip Hill, Baltimore; James A. Gallivan, Boston; T. J. Sabath, Chicago; Clarence MacGregor, Buffalo; John C. Kleczka, Milwaukee; Frederick R. Lehlbach, Newark, N. J.; Geo. G. Graham, Philadelphia; H. Garland Dupre, New Orleans; James O'Connor, New Orleans; Vincent M. Brennan, Detroit; Walter M. Chandler, New York City; A. E. Olpp, West Hoboken, N. J.; C. A. Newton, St. Louis; Albert B. Rossdale, Bronx, New York; James J. Connolly, Philadelphia; Isaac Siegel, New York City; Michael J. Hogan, Brooklyn; J. Charles Linthicum, Baltimore; John Kissel, Brooklyn; Lester D. Volk, Brooklyn; Joseph McLaughlin, Philadelphia; A. L. Kline, Brooklyn; Nathan D. Perlman, New York City; L. C. Dyer, St. Louis; W. J. Burke, Pittsburgh; Sydney Mudd, La Plata, Md.; James M. Mead, Buffalo; Thomas Jefferson Ryan, New York City; Guy E. Campbell, Crafton, Penna.; Clark Burdick, Newport, R. I.; Harry C. Ransley, Philadelphia; Amos Radcliffe, Paterson, N. J.; John A. Carew, New York City; Charles G. Bond, Brooklyn; Daniel J. Riordan, New York City; M. Ansorge, New York City; Thomas H. Cullen, Brooklyn; John I. Nolan, San Francisco; R. P. Freeman, New London, Conn.; Charles B. Ward, Debruce, N. Y.; E. Hart Fenn, Wethersfield, Conn.; D. G. Classon, Oconto, Wisc.; Julius Kahn, San Francisco; John M. Morin, Pittsburgh; Florian Lampert, Oshkosh, Wisc.; Herbert W. Taylor, Newark, N. J.; Meyer London, New York City; C. D. Sullivan, New York City; John J. Kindred, Astoria, N. Y.; Anthony J. Griffin, New York City.

Analysis of Congressional Primaries most Encouraging

Nominations have been made in Oregon, South Dakota, Illinois, Indiana, Pennsylvania, North Carolina and Iowa, and the results give proof that the appeal for wine and beer made by the Association Opposed to National Prohibition has not thus far been effective. One hundred and two candidates for Congress have been nominated by the two major parties and United States Senators in Florida, Iowa, Pennsylvania and Indiana, and there is only one instance in all these districts where a dry Congressman or Senator has been defeated by an avowed wet candidate. This happened in the Peoria district of Illinois. The drys in the fall elections will give their best efforts to electing the dry man on the other ticket. In at least three Congressional districts wet Congressmen have been replaced by dry candidates in the primaries. In Florida and North Carolina every Congressman who has supported national prohibition was renominated. In Orgeon there was only one contest and that in the Portland district. Three candidates were openly against any weakening of the Volstead Act. One candidate made his campaign on the wine and beer platform, and out of 42,438 votes cast he received but 2,214.

Claim that Labor is for Wine and Beer not Justified

Who will deny that there was a genuine test in the thirty-third Congressional district of Pennsylvania? Under the re-districting plan, this is said to be one of the largest industrial Congressional districts in the United States. The Congressman from that district, Mr. Clyde Kelley, is a strong prohibition advocate. His chief opponent ran on the wine and beer platform. Mr. Kelley was renominated on the Republican ticket by a majority of 11,900, by a vote of 3 to 1 on the Democratic ticket, and unanimously on the Prohibition party ticket. This result leads to the conclusion that the men and women who toil think more of other issues than of wine and beer. Arouse the women to their responsibility at the polls and the results in primary elections which quickly follow one another in the months of July, August and September will not disappoint!

Nation to Express Readiness to Co-operate in Next Step for World Peace

Plans adopted by the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments, with which the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union co-operates, will help give expression of the readiness of the American people to work together in the next step toward world peace. Thousands of messages in the form of letters, telegrams, and radio messages will be sent to the president of the United States on the morning of July 29. To the Chief Executive of the Nation will be conveyed the desire of the people to help make sure there will be no more war. "It must not be again."

A part of the plan is to be a simultaneous displaying throughout the country, on the morning of July 29, of placards bearing the three words, "No More War." In the windows of homes and offices, and on fences, trees, automobiles, and wherever possible, these posters will appear. They will be supplied by the National Council free of cost.

No-More-War demonstrations, to express "the will of the people to end war forever," began in three European cities in 1920. Last year demonstrations were held in 200 cities in England, France and Germany. This year ten nations of Europe have already agreed to participate—England, France, Germany, Holland, Sweden, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, Portugal and Switzerland.

Independent Citizenship for Women to be Considered by House

Representative John L. Cable, of Ohio, is sponsor for an independent citizenship for women bill, H. R. 12022, which has been reported to the House by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. There are good prospects of the bill being favorably considered by the House early in the week. The idea is to give the women equal rights with the men with reference to the Federal naturalization laws. The fact that a woman is married is no reason for denying her the right to citizenship in the United States through naturalization proceedings, if she is an eligible alien. Marriage of a citizen of the United States to a foreigner should not of itself terminate her citizenship. Hence, this proposed legislation to grant independent citizenship to women. Representative Cable's resume of the provisions of the bill will be given next week.

President Expected to Submit to Congress Views on Child Labor Legislation

In a letter to Representative Rogers of Massachusetts, President Harding expressed his sympathy for a constitutional amendment giving Congress power to control child labor, and said he hoped soon to communicate with Congress on the subject.

Social Hygiene Board Bill Needs Support

Kahn Bill, H. R. 11490, for transfer to the Department of Justice of the work done by the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board is still in the House Judiciary Committee. Hearings have been held and arguments ably presented for this transfer. The character of the work done by this Board in connection with the suppression of prostitution near military and naval stations, is well recognized and highly approved. Write your House members today, appealing for their support of Kahn, 11490.

Senator Willis of Ohio has estimated that "ten miles" of speeches have been made on the tariff bill. His estimate was based upon the distance that would be occupied if the Congressional records containing them were laid down end to end. And now we are troubled by the belief that such information given to the Senate will inspire the speech makers with the desire to make it reach around the world!

What is Legal Status of Liquor on Ships?

It is illegal to transport or possess beverage intoxicants on either foreign or American ships within the jurisdiction of the United States. A decision handed down by the United States Supreme Court on May 15, 1922, makes it clear that foreign and American ships are now amenable to the prohibition laws within the three-mile limit, irrespective of treaties. The court said, with reference even to shipments which were to pass through the country and not stop within our borders (Grogan v. Walker):

The Eighteenth Amendment meant a great revolution in the policy of this country, and presumably and obviously meant to upset a good many things on as well as off the statute book. It did not confine itself in any meticulous way to the use of intoxicants in this country. It forbade export for beverage purposes elsewhere. True this discouraged production here, but that was forbidden already, and the provision applied to liquors already lawfully made. See Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U. S. 146, 151, n. 1. It is obvious that those whose wishes and opinions were embodied in the amendment meant to stop the whole business. They did not want intoxicating liquor in the United States and reasonably may have thought that if they let it in once of it was likely to stay. When, therefore, the amendment forbids not only importation into and exportation from the United States, but transportation within it, the natural meaning of the words expresses an altogether probable intent. The Prohibition Act only clarifies in this respect the interpretation of the amendment itself. The manufacture, possession, sale and transportation of spirits and wine for other than beverage purposes are provided for in the act, but there is no provision for transshipment or carriage across the country from without. When Congress was ready to permit such a transit for special reasons in the Canal Zone, it permitted it in express words. Title III, par. 20 41 Stat. 322."

Former Assistant Attorney General Ferson ruled that American ships are prohibited from selling liquor even outside of the three mile limit. According to the Legal Department of the Shipping Board, they are not. This ruling, of course, does not cover foreign ships. More foreign than American vessels come to our shores. Congressional action is proposed to solve the problem.

American Legion in National Essay Contest

To promote interest in patriotism among the younger generation, the American Legion is offering three prizes for the best essays submitted on the subject: "How the American Legion Can Best Serve the Nation." First prize, $750; second, $500, third $250. These cash prizes are to be used by the winners in helping to pay for a scholarship in any college that they may designate. National Commander Hanford MacNider has contributed the money to be used for the purpose.

Anti's Apply for Incorporation of "Big Church"

A late and original movement of the enemy in Denver, Colorado, is the application for the incorporation of the Big Church (not for pecuniary profit). In the article presented to the Secretary of State, "object (a)" reads:

"Encouragement of daily prayer and communion with the God of the universe by the lawful and temperate use, in sacraments, of alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter or wine, or any spirituous, vinous, malt or fermented liquor, liquids or compounds which are fit for health-sustaining and beverage purposes, the amount of any beverage so used by any one individual at any one time not exceeding two finger-widths in an ordinary drinking glass."

Attorney General Keyes advised the rejection of the application, on the ground that "the statutes make no specific provision for the incorporation of this kind of an organization with such an aggregation of purposes."

The chief promoter of the Big Church is the editor of the so-called "Go-to-Church" paper, which contains subtle arguments against prohibition and is freely distributed with enclosures of the constitution and propaganda of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment.

Clean-up of Drug Store Liquor Sales

The New York Board of Pharmacy is planning a campaign against druggists who are said to be deriving their principal income from the illegal sale of whisky, according to the Christian Science Monitor of June 1, and as fast as they are convicted they will be deprived of their state licenses. The charge is made that some of these drug stores are conducted by former saloon keepers, in the same quarters in which saloons formerly were operated. A licensed pharmacist is engaged (bribed by the offer of a good salary), application made for a state license and a "drug store" is opened. As soon as the store is opened for business a permit is obtained which authorizes the proprietor to have whisky upon the premises, and as fast as stocks are depleted through illegal sales they are replenished with liquor obtained from rum runners and illicit distillers. Because druggists have permits to have whisky on hand, and because they conceal the source of their supplies, Federal dry agents are badly handicapped in their efforts to apprehend dry law violators.

California Property Owners Held Responsible for Liquor Sales

Press reports are saying that announcement has been made by United States District Attorney John T. Williams to the effect that hereafter abatement proceedings will be promptly brought against all property owners in San Francisco and elsewhere where liquor selling has been going on in their premises, and that such places will be closed for a year as the law provides. Attorney Williams also states that the Internal Revenue Bureau will take steps in the future to enforce the Government's first lien against such property where bootleggers have been operating and there are unpaid penalties. To the end that banks and holders of mortgages may have an opportunity to protect themselves and aid in the enforcement of the law, the San Francisco financial institutions have been asked and have agreed to co-operate with the Department and will start foreclosure proceedings where possible on property thus used in violation of the law.

Tennessee Judge Calls Both Purchaser and Seller of Liquor Criminals

"Judge Ross has charged the Federal grand jury that the purchase of liquor is an offense just as much as its sale, and that an agreement between the purchaser and the seller constitute a conspiracy to violate the Federal prohibition law," says the Memphis (Tenn.) Scimitar of May 23, and intimates that it is a rude shock to some of the first citizens to know that they have been placed in a category with the men with whom they transact business; that in the eyes of the law the man who buys liquor is no better than the one who sells it.

National Women's Trade Union League Passes Resolutions of Interest to W. C. T. U. Workers

The National Women's Trade Union League in their annual meeting at Waukegan, Illinois, June 10, passed without amendment the following resolution:

"RESOLVED, That the National Women's Trade Union League stands unequivocally for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment through the laws passed by Congress for this purpose."

Other resolutions of interest to W. C. T. U.'s that have adopted the Women in Industry department were:

For "constructive measures to prevent industrial distress" . . . "from unemployment" and "an adequate public employment service";

For public sentiment and legislation "for a sixteen year child labor minimum";

A protest against the Supreme Court child labor decision;

Support "of the present movement in this country for adult workers' education";

A pledge "to arouse the conscience of our own group" and to "co-operate with every group that is working in the interests of peace";

To "urge the National Woman's Party to discontinue its efforts for blanket legislation, federal or state, as a means of removing civil and legal discrimination against women," and to "support specific legislation to correct specific discriminations";

To request of Congress "an investigation into the economic status and labor conditions of women in the home, both of the 20,000,000 working in their own homes and the 2,000,000 working for wages."

Fight Against Wine-Drinking in Italy

The Associated Press is authority for the report that Commendatore Giacomo Boni, the celebrated excavator of the Roman Forum and the Palatine, has started a campaign among the workers in Italy against wine-drinking, which has increased greatly since the war, as a consequence of the high wages received.

Responsibility of Physicians with Regard to Alcoholism

According to the Journal of the American Medical Association, the French Society of Abstinent Physicians, considering the special responsibility of the medical profession as regards alcoholism, has adopted a resolution, urging physicians to be conscious of this responsibility:

"To respect on all occasions, and especially when prescribing, the habits and convictions of abstainers, as well as the integrity of those who have not yet been affected by alcohol; to eliminate from therapeutic and alimentary prescriptions preparations and beverages containing alcohol, as it is proved that there is no therapeutic indication for alcohol or fermented beverages and that they can be replaced by other medicines; to collaborate, with the help of observations made in their hospital service and among their clients, and of methodical and unbiased experiences based on the effects of abstinent regimen in patients and healthy persons, with a view of making an impartial inquiry into the therapeutic value of alcohol, and to join in the efforts made everywhere against alcoholism."

PURITY AND TOTAL ABSTINENCE

Mrs. Mary H. Augsbury

"Purity and total abstinence must go together; the two must rise or fall together; and when we find that the Siamese twins of civilization are purity and total abstinence, when we find that we must foster both or each will die, then we shall have widened our cause as God wants to see it widened," said Frances E. Willard.

To me these words of the great leader and organizer are warning signals prophetically hung out for our own time. Do we say, and believe it with all our hearts, "Prohibition has come to stay," and then with this great truth so unequivocally and unconditionally uttered still ringing in our ears, forget that while the evil of impurity still stalks abroad the most splendid of prohibition achievements are imperiled? Perhaps we had better say this evil crawls abroad, for impurity is one of those loathsome, reptilian sins that make darkness their covert and depend upon their very hideousness to keep them from exposure and annihilation.

If it is true—and who can doubt that it is—that "we must foster both" purity and abstinence "or each will die," then every loyal heart who has had part in the hard-fought battle against the liquor traffic, and who guards jealously the achievements of that battle and wishes to make them permanent, must realize that before us lies another conflict, the conflict against impurity, a conflict begun long ago and still unended; a conflict to which we must bring not a part but all of our forces and resources, realizing to the full the strength and subtlety of our foe; a conflict which, in the opinion of our great leader and the thought of all serious and well informed minds, we must win, or sooner or later the triumphs of our great war on intemperance will be lost.

There are difficulties which to hearts without faith may well seem insuperable, but let us not be dismayed by them, for we, too, have many things in our favor. The source of the great stream of civilization is the home, and by means of it we can reach every separate particle of humanity that flows through this great channel of human progress, onward to the sea of eternity. And if we thus reach every human particle, or individual, and assure individual purity, the stream of humanity as a whole will be purified.

Does it seem slow work, this one by one method? It is no slower than any other process of uplift for humanity. This is the way our sons and daughters are sent forth into life's fray. One after another they leave the home nest, ca y- ing with them principles largely d for a lifetime by the training and at s- phere of the home. It is only when e awakening shall come and "organ d mother love" shall determine that pt one for whose being and well-b g mother love is responsible shall be st to the cause of purity, that our goal n awakened and educated public conscie e, public sentiment created and much e t- ing sentiment recreated—will be in s t. I repeat that we can do this only y reaching, through the home, every i- vidual with the message of purity, e two-edged warnings against impu y which truth and humanity compel u o sound, and by holding up before on ing generations the beauty of purit of soul and body, until it becomes inwro ur in the very fibers of their beings, d thus incorporated in our national d universal life.

When men and women, boys and g s- learn that in God's moral law "ther e neither male nor female," and that he cardinal sin of impurity is not in b ig found out but in transgressing on of God's fundamental laws, and that "e y transgression shall receive a just re n- pense of reward"—then we may confi t ly look for that "white life for two" w h is so pre-eminently essential to succe u and happy homes th world around.

POLITICS AND PUBLIC EDUCATION

Deborah Knox Livingston

Public education has been something less than one hundred and fifty years in existence, and the United States of America was the first nation to provide for free public education for its future citizens. Until the public school system came into being, education was greatly neglected. Only a very few could obtain books, for there were very few to obtain. The printing press had not been invented, and such books as existed were written by hand and were very expensive. No government had even dreamed of appropriating money for public schools, and while in the countries where there were state churches, the church had schools, these schools were only open to boys, as education for girls was not even thought of either by church or state. In many instances, the masters of trade shops, where large numbers of apprentices were employed, provided some education, but it was extremely limited and in most cases only along such lines as would help them in their trades. The trade schools were well known in Scotland and England long before these countries had provided a system of public education. Germany, perhaps, excelled all other nations in its trade schools, even up to the year of 1914, when the world was thrown into the great war.

Here in the United States it was recognized very early in our life as a nation that we must provide for public education. Dr. Benjamin Rush wrote, shortly after he had signed the Declaration of Independence: "The business of education has acquired a new complexion by the independence of our country. It is only by rendering knowledge universal that a republican form of government can be preserved." This universal education has been the bulwark of the American Republic, for it has brought knowledge to the black man as well as the white, to the red man and also to the yellow man; the child of the poor as well as of the rich, and the alien as well as the native born child.

The United States has demonstrated to the world that well educated citizens help to make a great and worthwhile country. So generally has this been recognized that every civilized country today has some system of public education. In addition to the public schools, we have other great educational agencies, such as the free public libraries, which can be found in almost every locality. Here boys and girls can find anything and everything that they desire "without money and without price." In the larger cities are to be found art galleries and museums open at least part of the time free to the public. Here art students can come and revel in the beauties of paintings and sculptures, and all the people share in that which contributes so largely to the beautiful and true in life.

Doubtless there is no more important agency in the educating of the public than is found in the press, and here in the United States we have a free press. The framers of the Constitution recognized that, for it says, "Congress shall make no laws..... abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

The press perhaps more than any other agency of public education keeps us informed not only as to what is going on in the world at large, but regarding the affairs of our own government. We learn whether our public officials are doing their duty or not, the issues which are being discussed in our own communities, and the legislation which is before our state and national governments for enactment.

With all these agencies of education government deals; therefore politics has a part in molding the policies that govern these agencies; but the public school system is perhaps more directly the object of politics than any other of these agencies.

To begin with, the government provides education in many schools, beginning in most states with the kindergarten, up through the primary, grammar, high school, normal school and state colleges or universities. Besides these, there are special schools for the deaf and d b. the blind, and open air schools for e children afflicted with tuberculosis r other wasting diseases.

To make possible this vast syste of public education, large sums of m y are appropriated each year by local, s e and national governments. If we ld these amounts together, it is estim d that each year we spend in the U d States $700,000,000. It has been comp d that each boy and girl in the lower gr es costs the community $15 to $35 a r, while the average expense for a gh school pupil is from $40 to $100 er year. This great sum of money i e ceived from taxes and the taxpayer as the right, more, it is his duty, to see at the desired results are achieved by so great an expenditure. He has a ht to know whether by this expenditur e are raising a better and wiser cit n- ship; for if our educational system rs only an academic development, and ot that which builds for the moral inte ty of our citizens, then our educational s- tem has failed.

In considering the question of p ic education, we must remember tha it includes the public school buildings nd their equipment, the public school tea er and the curriculum, and also the ele on of school committees, the electio of state commissioner of public instruc n, school supervisors and superintend s and all these are very closely relate to politics. Party politics, alas, in too m y instances has dominated in many sec ns of our country the policies and app nt- ments of our public school system If there is one branch of government a ve all others that should be free from he dominance of party politics, it shou be that branch which deals with the e a- tion of the boys and girls who are he citizens of tomorrow. If there is ne branch of government above all o rs about which women should be intelli nt, and active in directing, it should b he branch of government which deals th public education. We have no gr er task in government than to see that e ry boy and girl gets an education, e ier

PRISON REFORM A LABOR OF LOVE

Anna Marden DeYo, State Corresponding Secretary

"Love lifted me,
Love lifted me,
When nothing else could help
Love lifted me."

Can you hear the lilt of it? A melody that came welling up from the throats of hundreds of gray clad young men and boys of San Quentin on Sabbath morning in the chapel service on Mothers' Day. It was the opening song, the choice of the men themselves, and it set the key-note for all that came after.

Would that I could picture the scene for you. The crowded chapel, every seat taken and every available bit of standing room as well. In the rear of the room well filled book shelves speaking of the educational work being carried on. In front over against the piano, a table banked with carnations, the gift of the Christian Endeavorers, soon to carry their fragrant message to each heart.

The state president and corresponding secretary of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of California were the guests of Chaplain and Mrs. O. C. Laizure, and were thus privileged to share in this memorable day.

The young people of the Christian Endeavor Society gave a fine program, followed by an address by Dr. A. Watson Bronn of Sacramento. The sacrifice of Mother was pictured in the mothers of the Mayflower, fourteen of the original eighteen giving up their lives during that first awful winter. The speaker brought mother love to us in Kipling's lines:

If I were hanged on the highest hill,
Mother o' Mine, O Mother o' Mine,
I know whose love would follow me still,
Mother o' Mine, O Mother o' Mine."

A cornet solo, "Inspiration," was a feature of the program and to the W. C. T. U. of California it holds a peculiar interest:

At the last state convention in October, 1921 Mrs. Laizure, our superintendent of Prison Reform, had touchingly told of the need of the band at San Quentin and had expressed a hope that the mothers of California might give the much needed band instruments and that the "White Ribbon Mothers" might give the solo cornet. Our women considered it a privilege to contribute toward this and the best possible solo cornet was purchased and engraved "From the White Ribbon Mothers of California to the San Quentin Band." When the Thanksgiving service was held in San Quentin, Mrs. Addie Garwood Estes, state president, presented the cornet, which was received by the leader of the band, Professor D. G. Gallur, born in Barcelona, Spain, a graduate of the Conservatory of Music in Milan, Italy; a composer of note, and a life prisoner. He was greatly moved by the gift, and assured us that our loving thought, so beautifully expressed, would inspire them to better work. As evidence of this comes the cornet solo, "Inspiration," written by Professor Gallur, and dedicated by him to "The White Ribbon Mother—Mrs. Addie Garwood Estes."

San Quentin's chaplain and educational director, O. C. Laizure, has been accorded high praise by Frank Tannenbaum in his recent article in the Atlantic Monthly. In the February, 1922, number, he says: "There is only one institution which has undertaken to face the prison problems seriously, and that is San Quentin. San Quentin is not a model prison. It has many faults. But its health and educational activities are real contributions to the prison problem. There I found a genuine interest in education, and an ambition to attempt the experiment of turning the prison into an educational institution. Some nine hundred men were registered in eleven hundred individual courses. The chaplain who is in charge of the work has, with the co-operation of the University of California, made a genuine beginning of what is the most interesting and promising educational experiment in American prisons. He has succeeded in building up a staff of inmates as assistants, and the university provides an occasional lecturer. The work was in full progress and gave evidence of much enthusiasm."

Many of you will remember hearing Chaplain Laizure in the Prison Reform Conference during the San Francisco National W. C. T. U. convention. We believe you will also remember Mrs. Laizure, our state superintendent of Prison Reform. She is an outstanding woman, a woman of convictions, a woman who does her own thinking. A forceful and interesting speaker, much in demand by outside organizations, she is making "Prison Reform" one of the foremost departments in the W. C. T. U. of California. Her message, recently delivered before the San Francisco Center of the National League of Women Voters, the largest single organization of women in the city of San Francisco, opened to them a new realm of thought. Her charming personality, gracious manner and intimate knowledge of her subject brings conviction and creates a desire to co-operate with our work. Mrs. Laizure believes that to prevent is a much bigger job than to cure, in that, "to cure we call in an expert and in order to prevent we must all know how." The study of the cause of crime and the contributing factors is the first step in its prevention.

"Lead Thou us on" until perchance the future may hold for us the possibility of the closing of the doors of San Quentin and kindred institutions.

Politics and Public Education

through the day schools or night schools, or by the continuation schools which are found in some states where employers must allow boys and girls in their employ a certain number of hours a week which must be spent in school.

It is generally conceded that school life itself is one of the best methods of training citizens. In school, boys and girls learn the rights of others as they relate to property. In school, the majority of children learn for the first time the necessity for the observance of law and the need of acting unselfishly for the general welfare. They soon discover that there are no such things as personal rights, when those rights interfere with the discipline of the school.

It is in the public school that the first great lessons of democracy are learned, for there no aristocracy is recognized save the aristocracy of brains. It is the public school which teaches the "team" spirit, enables us to work together for the good of the whole, and that is the teaching which will make the worthwhile citizens of the future, those citizens who must establish the great principles of government by the science of politics, which will govern our relationships in our own and other countries.

Public education is a part of our great political system; let us not fail in our duty to participate in the opportunities and responsibilities which are involved.

Mobilize a Million Members

CONTINUE YOUR MEMBERSHIP DRIVE DURING THE SUMMER MONTHS

HERE'S THE WAY TO FORGET THE HEAT

Michigan W. C. T. U. is putting on a summer whirlwind membership campaign that will furnish breezes to cool the torrid temperature of July and August. The women of that state will soon be so busy securing new members they will not have time to watch the mercury creep up to the nineties in the thermometer. Working for a Million Members is the best recipe on record for keeping cool in summer.

"THERE WILL BE NO CESSATION OF OUR EFFORTS THROUGH THE SUMMER"

"The weeks designated for the intensive membership campaign have passed. That does not mean that the time for special effort to win new members and organize new unions is over," writes the president of the Colorado W. C. T. U. to her unions. "The work is only well started and is to continue to October second, when the state treasurer's books close for this year. WINNING NEW MEMBERS WHEREVER YOU MAY BE SHOULD BE A DEFINITE PART OF THE SUMMER PLAN."

TAKE YOUR MESSAGE TO READY-MADE AUDIENCES

"Many unions are saying it is almost impossible to secure an audience for a temperance speaker," says the president of the Connecticut W. C. T. U. "We suggest you take your messages to audiences already gathered without invitation from you—the great crowds that attend our fairs, and other summer festivities. Begin now to prepare for these great opportunities, where you can distribute literature, display posters, and reach the people..... Try having a program for continued work all through the summer. Nearly everybody li picnics, lawn parties, festivals and rid Have at least one every month. Inv the L. T. L. and Y. P. B. Give then part in the program."

"Success is ten per cent opportunity and ninety per cent hustle."

Somebody Said It Couldn't Be Done

Adapted and Feminized

"Somebody said that it couldn't be done,
But she with a chuckle, replied
That 'maybe it couldn't' but she would be one
Who wouldn't say so till she'd tried.
So she buckled right in, with the trace of a grin;
If she worried at all, she hid it.
She started to sing as she tackled the thing
That couldn't be done, and she did it.

"There are thousands to tell you it cannot be done,
There are thousands who prophesy failure;
There are thousands to point out to you, one by one,
The dangers that wait to assail you;
But buckle right in with a bit of a grin,
Roll up your sleeves and go to it;
Just start to sing as you tackle the thing
That 'cannot be done,' and you'll do it."

MISSOURI TO STAY ON THE ME BERSHIP JOB ALL SUMMER

"We have had twenty new unions ganized since the state conventio writes the corresponding secretary the Missouri W. C. T. U., "and three p sonal workers are now out in the sta I am glad to report some good resu in St. Louis, secured by the old Me bership Contest plan, and through a p sonal worker. One union added 51 n paid members in a membership conte Since May 15, the close of the Federat W. C. T. U. year, 140 new members ha been gained."

WIN MEMBERS ON YOUR AU TRIPS

The president of the Montana W. T. U. urges every member in her st to use the next three months in enlist new members, saying, "You can v them while on your auto trips; you c win them at your church societies, y outings, picnics and social affairs. T them about the wet organizations wo ing for the repeal of the Volste Law..... On your outings, your sh trips and your long trips, wherever go, always wear the white ribbon, little silent reminder that you repres a body of loyal, conscientious, ho loving women who stand for the p tection of the home against every e that threatens its peace and happines

"Hats Off to the W. C. T. U."

Editorial in Muskegon (Mich.) Chronicle, June 12

Regardless of viewpoints on the merits of the prohibition issue, Michigan gives unanimous attention today to the decisions and the policies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, whose annual convention for this state is now in progress here.

That is quite a remarkable change of attitude, a change that is most marked as compared with only a decade ago. Then this organization of women was considered with something akin to good-natured toleration, even by those friendly inclined toward its purpose, while those hostile regarded it with supreme contempt. Not even yet, when the final triumph of its cause was so comparatively near, did the nation, either friend or foe, realize the tremendous revulsion of sentiment that had come over this land, largely as the result of the patient, persistent labors of this band of undiscouraged women.

The Anti-Saloon League served to crystallize sentiment into action, but it reaped where the Woman's Christian Temperance Union had sown, else its work would have needed many more years if indeed it ever had promise of success.

The suddenly altered status of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of today, when the astonishing victory it won in the making of prohibition the law of the land has given authority to its words, is a signal reward of the kind of patience and persistence in the face of discouragements that wins battles, and that is peculiarly the characteristic of the type of womanhood that has been represented by this organization. It is a type that America can well be thankful for, the very salt of the earth, no matter what one's opinions may be about the particular cause in which it has been engaged for these nearly fifty years. In a time when the very foundations of our system of free government and ballot-box sovereignty are threatened by insidiously sapping forces from below and the superstructure is withstanding assaults from the forces sometimes referred to as "higher up" and that conceive themselves above the law, such an organization as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its method of direct appeal to the conscience and the ballot box stands as a strong bulwark against destruction. And now that the ballot is in the hands of woman, her voice is going to be listened to with more respect than ever before.

Are You a Slacker?

During the coming pre-election months, the statements quoted herewith, recently made by former Congressman Randall in an address, arguments giving mathematical demonstration of the reason for bad government—namely, the failure of the "good citizen" to perform his duty at the ballot box—should be used to good effect. Study these figures:

"A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. A ballot in the box is worth ten at home on the veranda.

"A hundred wet votes in the ba box will defeat a thousand dry votes posited anywhere else.

"The church-member vote alone, 100 per cent deposited in the ballot b would guarantee the success of Wright law in California. Three hund and fifty thousand persons are memb of Protestant churches in California.

"The Harris enforcement law, sim to the Wright act, was defeated two ye ago by 65,000 majority. This is an a age of 16 votes to each precinct. eight church members in each preci failed to register and eight failed to v though registered, then the defeat chargeable to these sixteen church m bers in each precinct.

"Two years ago 386,552 Califor registered voters failed to go to polls on election day. This was wit 71,000 of being one-third of the en registered vote of the state.

"But in San Francisco where the jority against the Harris enforcement was 77,000, only 11,586 of the voters the polls failed to vote on that act.

"In the balance of California, wh the majority for the Harris act was 000, more than 110,000 failed to v either way on the Harris act.

"This is an amazing demonstrat n of the fact that the wets never fai o vote upon the issue, while a suffic t percentage of those who would vote e other way, fail through indifference d carelessness to secure a victory wh is theirs by the simplest rule of ma matics."

LABOR LEADERS OUTSPOKEN FOR PROHIBITION

NATIONAL WOMEN'S TRADE UNION LEAGUE PASSES STRONG ENFORCEMENT RESOLUTION—GRAND CHIEF OF BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS FOUR-SQUARE FOR EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT—NINETY-FIVE PER CENT OF RAILROAD MEN WOULD VOTE DRY PROPHESIES PENNSYLVANIA LABOR OFFICIAL

Working People Not Clamoring for Beer

Hon. John G. Cooper, Member of Congress

It is not the working people of our country who are clamoring for the return of the liquor traffic, and it is far from the facts when anyone makes the statement that organized labor as a whole favors the return of wine and beer.... I do not challenge the right of Mr. Gompers, or any other leader, to express his own views and sentiments in favor of the repeal of the prohibition laws, but I do challenge the right of anyone to speak for the thousands of lawabiding workingmen and women of our country who joined hands with others and banished this un-American institution from the land.

Some time ago I wrote letters to many leaders of organized labor throughout the country. The response to my canvass indicated that a large number of them were strongly in favor of prohibition.

Drunkenness Has Decreased At Least Seventy-Five Per Cent, Says Head of Locomotive Engineers

"The longer I live, and the more I see of it (the liquor traffic) the more bitterly I am opposed to the manufacture and sale of liquor, because I look upon it as the basis and foundation of ninety per cent of the crime and criminals we have in the country today." This is the reply of Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, to a questionnaire sent out by the Manufacturers' Record, asking if he were still opposed to the traffic in strong drink.

"In my study of the labor problems," continues Mr. Stone, "I find a marked improvement in the number of men who are saving their money and who own their homes or are buying their homes, and I find a decided improvement in the home life of the workers due to the fact that the women and children have more food, more clothing and better care in every way. Back of all that, the worker takes his family and goes to the picture show or to the park now, when he formerly spent his evenings in the saloon drinking and spending his money..... I think I can truthfully say that drunkenness has decreased at least 75 per cent among the workers."

National Women's Trade Union League Endorses Enforcement of Federal Prohibition

The National Women's Trade Union League, at its annual convention at Waukegan, Illinois, June 10, passed the following resolution: "RESOLVED, That the National Women's Trade Union League stands unequivocally for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment through the laws passed by Congress for this purpose."

"NINETY-FIVE PER CENT OF US WOULD VOTE DRY"

By a Railroad Man

In reply to letters sent to certain labor leaders inquiring their attitude on the prohibition question, the following "peppy" answer was received from J. H. McIlvenny, of Newcastle, Pa., secretary and treasurer of Division No. 565, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers:

"While of course I am not one of the big fellows in the union labor field and don't claim to know as much about the sentiment of the union labor men throughout the nation as do Brother Stone and some of the other leaders, as secretary-treasurer of one of the largest Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineer divisions in this part of the country, I do claim to know the sentiment of the men in this particular section, and unless the men are lying—and I know they are not—ninety-five per cent of the railroad men would, if it were put to them, VOTE DRY.

"Now I don't mean that ninety-five per cent of us are what Billy Sunday would call DRY. Many of us would take a drink if it was still sold at a price we could afford to pay, but now that the temptation has almost entirely disappeared—and it has, in spite of the claims of the personal license advocates—there isn't any man endowed with as much sense as God gave a goose that would turn his hand or lift a shovel of dirt from Old John Barleycorn's grave, that he might be disinterred and this soul-destroying curse given license to spoil our homes, disgrace our children, and Rule 'G' again become of sinister meaning to many good men that have forgotten that such a rule ever existed. The union labor leader who says that the working man wants his beer and wine is either a big fool or has invested his money in a brewery and has outlived his usefulness, and should and will be discredited by every home lover and father of children who has any pride in his children and is interested in their future—and show me one that isn't interested in his home and children. I care not how far down the social scale he may be, or how poor he may be, the sentiment is there; he wants his children to advance..... The Union labor man has just as lofty ideals as any other class of men and is able to think as clearly.

"Any so-called labor leader, boss or politician, who tries to make the people believe the laboring men are crying for the repeal of the Volstead Law, is an enemy of labor, and like the war profiteer is simply throwing a smoke screen to hide his own contemptible hide. The people who are doing their best to make the Eighteenth Amendment a mockery are not the laboring men, for anyone with an ounce of wit knows that the price of liquor is prohibitive to men who work for wages.

"One hears a good deal said about there being as much booze drunk now as ever there was. What a falsehood! I could tell some things about conditions on the railroads before the Eighteenth Amendment that would curl your hair, but it wouldn't be diplomatic, perhaps. When one looks back at the old days and remembers the many good fellows that lost out because they thought they could take a drink or leave it alone but failed to convince the superintendent, one compares those times with conditions as they are today; from the cab to the cabin, men with bright eyes, clear heads and brains, each man feeling and knowing that if anything goes amiss, it won't be said that Rule 'G' had been violated.

"The sense of security that an engineer, conductor and dispatcher now have when compared with other days is of such incomparable value to us that even to think of going back to pre-Volstead times will be enough to cause every red-blooded, clean-thinking, true American, two-fisted fighting man, to rise in his might and forever crush this curse of humanity. Don't let them kid you that we railroad men want booze resurrected. Whoever says we do is a liar and the truth is not in him. If I haven't made this strong enough, let me know and I shall be only too glad to amplify it in any way I can."

"We Do Not Favor Interference with Eighteenth Amendment", Declares Labor Paper

Not long ago the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment sent out a questionnaire to labor bodies to sound the opinion of labor on the question. The Union Labor Bulletin of Newark, N. J., made the following answer:

1. We favor prohibition.
2. We do not favor interference with the Eighteenth Amendment, nor its repeal.
3. We favor absolute annihilation of the saloon where it may serve to prostitute the morals of the region to which it caters.
4. We condemn the sale of light wines or beers with meals in restaurants or hotels.
5. We disapprove of the sale of light wines or beers for consumption anywhere.
6. Our employes have increased their efficiency 100 per cent because of prohibition.
7. We cannot encourage anyone to join your association.
8. You may use this information in whatever manner will aid the return of this country to a sane enjoyment of prosperity, which is impossible where stimulants destroy brains and develop physical weakness, accentuate moral laxitude and lassitude, and undermine the real strength of government.

Mrs. Boole at National Headquarters

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, national W. C. T. U. vice-president-at-large, and honorary treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., spent several days in Evanston last week, in conference with her co-officers at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters. The Headquarters "family" are always delighted to have Mrs. Boole visit them.

W. C. T. U. Day at Chautauqua

Saturday, July 15, is to be W. C. T. U. Day at Chautauqua, New York. Dr. Valeria H. Parker, national W. C. T. U. director of the department of Social Morality and executive secretary of the U. S. Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, is to be the speaker. She has chosen as her subject, "The Government Program of Protective Social Measures."

Are We Downhearted?

The governor of Kentucky is reported recently to have given in an after-dinner speech this telling definition of an optimist: "A man who still carries a corkscrew."

Everything indicates that there is an increasing strain on the optimism of the individual to whom the governor refers. Apropos of the result of recent polls on the prohibition situation, the New York Evening Post says it seems evident that the people are changing from an attitude of hostility to one of friendliness toward the dry law. The Des Moines Register believes these polls show "which way public feeling is running" and the Chicago Evening Post foresees a popular uprising for strict enforcement.

A writer in the June American Review of Reviews says he has noticed in recent months that "booze news" has been more and more getting the inside pages or the waste basket, whereas six months ago such news was given generous space on the first page of metropolitan newspapers.

This changing attitude is indicated as well in the results at the primaries which have been held—so far exceedingly favorable to prohibition, there having been only one instance where a dry candidate for Congressman or Senator has been defeated by one avowedly wet.

It is conceded that this favorable vote at the primaries is due in considerable part to the women voters. Let the good work go on. Every local union should card-catalogue the women voters of its city, see them personally, present the issue and impress them with the necessity of voting for the right men, then follow up this interview with literature that will insure their not forgetting to cast their ballot for a dry candidate for Congress November 7.

Money Does Talk!

The result of THE UNION SIGNAL poll of leading bankers of the United States on the value of prohibition as a promoter of thrift has been broadcasted by The Associated Press and is receiving favorable comment by the newspapers. This dollars and cents argument seems to impress the New York Evening Mail, which says editorially, "The banks are neither religious institutions nor are they anti-saloon. Their business begins and ends with money. Their only emotion is arithmetic. Their only ideal is scrupulous accuracy. No witnesses could be more impartial. The verdict of the banks is unanswerable. When prohibition came into force, customers opened new accounts and savings mounted up. Since this year began 799 banks have increased their investments by $215,000,000. These savings do not belong to the banks. All that the banks do is to take care of them. The savings belong to millions of average families which are now that much better off. Is it any wonder that no statesman and no party dare tamper with prohibition?"

The Harrisburg (Pa.) News sees in the result of this survey "another refutation of the weird distortions of truth which the enemies of prohibition have been circulating. One banker said that the increase in his institution had been as much as thirty per cent. These facts exist undeniably all over the nation and wherever prohibition is an actuality. Drunkards have become home-owners. Spendthrifts have become savers. The poverty-stricken have become self-supporting. If nothing else beneficial resulted from prohibition than the increase of thrift and the growth of savings accounts of those who did not possess them previously, prohibition would be justified."

Money does undeniably talk with peculiar forcefulness to some people, and just now it is talking for prohibition. Call to the attention of the business men of your acquaintance who may be sceptical as to the practical value of the prohibitory law, the testimonies of prominent bankers of our large cities. They furnish a most convincing argument to men who live and move in the commercial world.

Say What You Think About Prohibition

In the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram for May 12 the editor tells his readers that only a "small, but determined element burned with zeal for such (prohibition) legislation," but that as the liquor business lacked something of a social standing, its defenders did not care to bring upon themselves denunciations and "didn't like to take the trouble to argue the real sociological and political reasons for their attitude. They remained inactive. The prohibitionists 'put it over.'"

To those who remember or have read of the time when it was considered not merely "strange," but almost a matter deserving social ostracism to turn down one's glass at the table; when a drunkard's child may have been looked down upon but the child of the saloonkeeper and the brewer moved in the "best society," it shows quite clearly the change in public sentiment when a professedly pro-liquor sheet speaks of the liquor business as lacking "social standing."

But the last paragraph of the editorial carries a germ of truth it would be well to consider:

"Democracies being what they are and legislative bodies keeping their ears pressed to the ground, the people who make the loudest noise stand more than an even chance of getting what they want."

In these days we must follow the advice of the editor, and "say what we think about prohibition," say it *con*sistently, *per*sistently, even *in*sistently. We must use facts, facts, FACTS in every shape and form. We want right to win. Let us say so hard enough, loud enough, and often enough to "get what we want."

DR. WILEY ON "WHAT THE DOCTORS THINK OF BOOZE"

A very interesting commentary on the ecent questionnaire sent to physicians of he United States by the American Medi- al Association is given by Dr. Harvey V. Wiley, in the June Good Housekeep- ng. This questionnaire has been referred o before in THE UNION SIGNAL, but)r. Wiley calls attention to certain facts hat are interesting and significant. It ppears that city physicians as a rule re more strongly in favor of whisky as medical agent than are country physi- ians. "The vote on beer in the 50 large ities was 5903 against its use and 2854 in avor of its use. The vote in these cities as 4939 against the use of wine and 782 in favor of its use. Wine, therefore, ade a stronger appeal to the doctors han beer.

"A peculiar condition was that in some f the large cities whisky was particular- y recommended as a remedy for snake ite, although the only snakes in such ities are carefully guarded in zoological ardens. It is a strange idea that has lmost universal prevalence, especially in ural districts, that whisky is a sovereign emedy for the bite of poisonous snakes. 'he most recent studies of snake-bite oisoning show that the remedy has laimed more victims of snake bite than ven the most enthusiastic snakes would laim. In other words, it is the opinion f the most competent physicians who ave studied this subject that the ad- inistration of alcohol is the chief cause f fatality in snake bite."

Dr. Wiley sums up his conclusions, as ollows:

"It has been only a few years since the eal nature of the functions of alcohol as been understood, based upon in- ubitable facts developed by experimental ethods. All the old physicians, and that means those who were graduated up to ten or fifteen years ago, were thorough- ly imbued with the idea taught by their professors of materia medica and thera peutics, that whisky was a stimulant; that it was useful in case of shock, of low vitality following a long disease, and especially in such diseases as pneu- monia and other acute infections. It is, therefore, perfectly reasonable to find that this opinion is still so prevalent.

"Take the case of snake bite, for in- stance. Probably if you would ask a thousand laymen what they would do for snake bite, they would say, 'Give whisky,' and I am not surprised to find that 51 per cent, at least, of the doctors of this country would say the same thing. Whisky, or any kind of administered alcohol, is now known to be a narcotic and a depressant and not a stimulant, and yet this knowledge has not filtered into the consciousness of more than half of the medical profession, much less the laity. It is quite human that this condition should exist. It is, you might say, 'bred in the bone.' It has been taught and believed by the people at large. It has been adopted as a sane doctrine by the medical profession. I for one am surprised that the vote in favor of whisky as a medical agent was not far greater. It will take time to redirect this feel- ing, and we might as well be patient about the matter, just as we will have to learn to be obedient to law, which we are not at the present time, in so far as prohibition is concerned, at least. So we must wait for the gradual change in the attitude of the medical profession, which is certain to come as the facts of science, determined by actual experiment, slowly filter into the inner consciousness of our people."

Tribute Paid to Social Morality Worker

"Where Girls Go Right" is the title of n illuminating article by Miriam Van Vaters, referee Juvenile Court of Los ngeles, in the May 27 issue of The Sur- ey. Under the sub-head "Community ontact" she pays a well deserved tribute o Mrs. Martha P. Falconer, associate in ie National W. C. T. U. department of ocial Morality. "One element in adjust- ient of a girl to normal life comes hrough the community," says Miss Van Vaters. "Really we are normal only in elation to the community. It was Martha . Falconer of Sleighton Farms, beloved ounder and builder of splendid institu- ons for the correction of youth, who nriched the correctional method by the lea of letting the community into the nstitution. She tells how the thought ccurred to her that the empty pews of ie village church might better be filled ith the bright faces of her girls; how ard it was to get the Board of Managers o buy the hats; and how delighted the inister and congregation were with the inging once they got used to the idea."

Meet Our New Social Morality Lecturer—Miss Scott

Miss Grace Leigh Scott of Indiana has een appointed lecturer for the depart- ient of Social Morality. Miss Scott has ad wide experience in welfare work. he did volunteer Juvenile Court work n Louisville, Kentucky, for a year, and hile in Chicago doing professional vocal ork, gave musicales and talks at Hull louse and "The Commons." In 1918 she went to Europe under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., staying one year. Dur- ing this time she gave entertainments and talks to the soldiers in various camps and did special street work in Paris. Since returning to the United States, she has acted as home secretary and so- cial worker for the Louisville Y. M. C. A., where she gave lectures to clubs and groups of factory workers. She has also within the past two years delivered a series of lectures before the high schools and business colleges of Indiana, and the public schools of New York, the latter in connection with their Americanization program. The National W. C. T. U. con- siders itself very fortunate in securing the services of so able and experienced a worker.

World Notes

"I have found medal contests to be very popular," writes Mrs. Myrtle B. Faucett of Muzaffurpur, Bihar, India, superintend- ent of Medal Contest work, "and once they are started they go by themselves. I have had the pleasure of introducing them into one school for European and Anglo-Indian children, and now they are so familiar with them that last year when I asked the principal if the usual yearly medal contest might be held she replied, 'Certainly! The children are so interested that they can now do most of the work unassisted, and I find they can even train themselves, the one holding a gold medal considering it quite an honor to train an aspirant for a silver medal.'" It is also planned to institute matrons' medal con- tests, although the women seem rather shy about entering. One, the first in all India, was held about four years ago.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide some- where,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, some- where,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Serve the Lord with gladness. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him, and bless his name. For the Lord is good.—Psalm 100:2, 4.

The Choice

What is the work I ought to do,
Now that the busy day dawns anew?
For tasks are so many and hours so few!

Do the work you will long to have done,
Fight the battle you will wish you had won
When shadows fall at the last set of sun.

What words should I utter, what message teach
Now when human thought and human speech
Are restless as waves that break on the beach?

Speak with clear voice, exultant or dread.
Say the words you will wish you had said,
When the sounding hours have to silence sped.

Life offers such rich gifts manifold—
Pleasure and honor and love and gold.
Which should I choose to have and to hold?

Out of these treasures so varied and vast
Choose what you'll wish you had chosen at last,
When life with all of its chances is past.

—Effie Smith Ely, Greeneville, Texas.

SUNDAY SCHOOL DEPARTMENT

The Next Temperance Sunday

July 16 is the date of our next Temperance Sunday in the Sunday school. The Quarterly Temperance Lesson, found in Daniel 5:1-31, includes the familiar story of the downfall of a great nation through vice and intemperance and opens the way for the consideration of sinful habits which will destroy character and life, not only of individuals but of nations. God's handwriting on the wall must be interpreted and the task falls upon His representatives in every walk of life. The lesson also affords an opportunity to emphasize personal total abstinence, purity of life, Christian patriotism and citizenship.

The golden text sounds the warning note to all who disobey God's law: "God will bring every work into judgment, with every hidden thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." Ecclesiastes 12:14. The general temperance topic suggested by the lesson is "Judgment passed on King Alcohol—his struggle for life." The program could well include brief character sketches of the "Daniels of the Temperance Reform."

The Quarterly Lesson leaflet, prepared to aid Sunday school teachers and officers, is now a two page leaflet, envelope size, costing but 20 cents per 100 and should be provided for all Sunday schools. It points out topics suited to each department, gives a blackboard outline for a temperance talk and suggests lesson applications. Samples of helpful literature for use on July 16 have been sent to over two hundred workers who are enrolled on the mailing list of the department. They also receive the department bulletin, the message to Sunday school workers and a personal letter of instruction. The enrollment fee is 50 cents, which covers postage. The sample literature is sent free.

Remember—Send to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois, for all literature of the department. The national superintendent sends out only the department bulletin and message to Sunday school workers. Sample free, and to workers 45 cents per 100. July 16 should find us circulating the World's Sunday school pledge, thus promoting the World's Sunday School Pledge-Signing Campaign. Our nation must lead all others in the effort to pledge the youth to total abstinence.

The Quarterly Temperance Lesson

The question raised by some as to whether, in the evolution of lesson systems by the International Lesson Committee, the Uniform Lesson system might not be supplanted by another, was answered by the committee at its last meeting. Our Sunday school workers will be glad to know that the action of the lesson committee was to maintain the Uniform Lesson series, which doubtless means that the quarterly temperance lesson will be included and we shall have four Temperance Sundays each year, or definite time fixed for temperance teaching in the Sunday school.

Our Next Objective

By the organization of daily Bible schools, vacation Bible schools and community training schools a new impetus has been given to religious educational work. This opens a new field of endeavor to this department and brings us to our next objective, which is the embodiment of Bible temperance, Christian patriotism and Christian citizenship in the curriculum provided for each of these schools, and to this end careful and judicious efforts are being made by the national superintendent.

The International Sunday School Convention

The coming international Sunday school convention, to be held in Kansas City, June 21-28, is one of great significance, as the National Sunday School Council and the International Association have merged and important steps toward a great religious educational movement are to be taken. The program provides for a temperance address and a temperance conference. The Sunday School department of the W. C. T. U. will install an exhibit of Sunday school literature and free samples will be given to delegates by the national superintendent. The Kansas City Federation of Unions will have charge of the booth. Miss Annie E. Monroe, the state superintendent, has been instrumental in making possible the exhibit and Mrs. Davis, the superintendent of the department for the federated unions, will preside at the booth.

Once more we urge, that Temperance Sunday, July 16, be well observed and a generous supply of literature be circulated. We suggest that each Sunday school worker send to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House for a catalogue of Sunday School department leaflets and all supplies for Sunday school work published, keeping a file of the same from which to select from time to time, and adding samples of new leaflets as prepared by the national superintendent.

Yours for more efficient Sunday school temperance work,

(Mrs.) Stella B. Irvine,
National Superintendent.

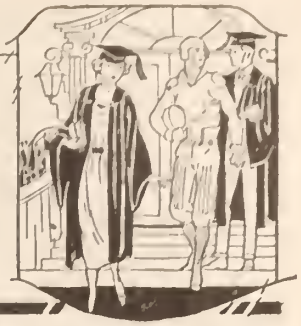
OUR YOUNG PEOPLE



Work Among Young People in North Dakota Given Impetus Through Visit of National Y. P. B. Secretary

Barbara H. Wylie, State Corresponding Secretary

North Dakota was fortunate to be included in the three months' itinerary of Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary, who was with us from May 9 to May 14—all too brief a time, but we made every day count.

Beginning at Dickinson, she addressed the students of the Normal school and was well received, Dr. S. T. May, president, having made the necessary arrangements. In Jamestown, Mrs. Eva Ashley Parslow, preceptress of the college, had prepared for her coming, and an address was given before the student body. This was followed by a noon luncheon given by the retiring cabinets of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. to the incoming cabinets. Mrs. Perkins, as guest of honor, made the most of the opportunity to present the work of the temperance committee, and received the assurance that it would be taken up by both of these religious bodies. A chairman of temperance committee was appointed. At the Twelfth District convention, then in session, Mrs. Perkins spoke of the Y. P. B. and the membership campaign. Mrs. Necia E. Buck, state Y. P. B. secretary, and the Y. P. B. girls present, were indeed happy to meet the national Y. P. B. secretary.

At Valley City, a reception had been arranged in the beautiful home of Dr. and Mrs. S. A. Zimmerman, with Mrs. Perkins and the members of the college Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. as guests. Here again temperance committees were appointed and the prize essay work taken up. Next morning, at the Normal school, Mrs. Perkins was heartily welcomed and her address highly commended by President Allen.

While in Fargo for a few hours, Mrs. Perkins spoke to members of the local unions, assembled to meet her, and in the evening at a meeting for young people, when she organized the Fargo Y. P. B.

She had a full program at Mayville, for Prof. Oscar M. Mehus of the Normal School had previously met her. She was given an ovation at the chapel hour and made a strong appeal. At this time, prizes were awarded for the best essays, sixty-six having been written in the Normal school, eighty-five in high school and eighty-five in upper grades. Mrs. Perkins spoke in the high school, addressed members of the local W. C. T. U., and by special request, spoke to the girls at the dinner hour in the evening. Here, too, the temperance committee was appointed with a competent chairman.

At Grand Forks, a luncheon at the Y. W. C. A. afforded an opportunity for members of the local union to meet Mrs. Perkins, and the membership campaign was taken up. Sunday morning, Mrs. Perkins spoke at Wesley College Chapel and in the evening, at the Methodist Episcopal church, making a deep impression.

Mrs. Perkins attracted young and old by her winsome personality, sweet disposition and kind and genial manner. She is a pleasing and fluent speaker, thoroughly conversant with the work which she so ably and convincingly presents.

Our Rally Cry

5,000 New Members, 500 New Branches, 500,000 Signatures to the Polyglot Petition.

Everybody Needed in the Y. P. B. Orchestra

It is not necessary for good team work that everybody pull with equal strength. Each member has her own peculiar gift and can help in her own way.

"A little old man sat in the rear of an orchestra, playing a piccolo, and longing to play one of the grand instruments such as a cornet or the first violin," says the Christian Endeavor World. "A sense of his insignificance so overwhelmed him that he stopped. Suddenly the conductor brought the orchestra to a pause in the midst of one of its most magnificent bursts of harmony, and called for the piccolo: 'Where is the piccolo? I cannot go on in this piece without the piccolo.' Then the little old man returned to his work with his heart full of happiness. He had learned that all pieces are needed to make a symphony."

Notes from a Field Worker's Diary

Fannie A. Drummond, National Y. P. B. Field Secretary

The Iowa state Y. P. B. convention, which was held at Humeston, met every expectation and our next field was Missouri, the state of the Ozarks, famed in song and story.

The heart of the white ribboner is the same everywhere—always she extends a cordial welcome and hearty co-operation. One union craved encouragement, another needed to catch the vision of youth, still another eagerly awaited definite Y. P. B. organization.

In colleges, schools, churches—everywhere we told of Y. P. B. possibilities, and the branches organized varied in size from King City, with seventy members, to Grand Valley, with seventeen.

Then in company with Mrs. Elizabeth Middleton, national Scientific Temperance Instruction director, Miss Jeannette Rankin, our first woman member of Congress, and Mrs. Lettie Hill May, state corresponding secretary, we held state regional conferences. At times the state officer in charge was changed to Mrs. Van Matre, state treasurer, or Miss Roena Shaner, state vice-president. At one conference Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of Child Welfare, joined us. These were supposed to be "dry" meetings in the interests of a "dry" cause but at times the atmosphere and surroundings were decidedly "wet," as we traveled through the flooded district.

From the conferences we slipped away for a little while to organize Branches in the schools. At Mountain Grove, a Y. P. B. with fifty members was formed. At Lebanon the superintendent of schools volunteered to be the leader for the Branch of sixty members organized in his high school.

At Springfield the clans gathered for the annual Y. P. B. state convention. It was a joy to look into the happy faces of the young people, many of whom we had met last year during our organizing tour of the state. Decided progress had been made and a fine state convention was held. "Mother" Carlton, the state Y. P. B. secretary, is a general and knows how to lead the forces. The state Y. P. B. president is Rachel Burger, a niece of Mrs. Nelle Burger, Missouri's state W. C. T. U. president. "Nuff sed." Would that we had space to give a detailed report of the banquet, the pageant as well as the dinners and social functions that were sandwiched in between our heavier work.

Crossing the border into Oklahoma, we found ourselves in the land of the Indian where "the world seems to be still in the making." At Tulsa we enjoyed the hospitality of the state president, Mrs. Josephine Buhl, and predict that her interest and enthusiasm will soon put her state in the front ranks in Y. P. B. work. Y. P. B. pledges to the number of 106 were taken.

It was Mayday at Bartlesville and the entire school were to go to the park for special exercises, but our message had a good hearing and 234 pledges for the Y. P. B. were signed.

At Tecumseh we met the Y. P. B. state secretary, Miss Rose Jordan, and her active Branch. Miss Jordan has a vision of big things for Oklahoma. How we wish we could mention every fine woman who in any way helped in our work and contributed to our comfort.

Leaving Enid one morning we had as fellow-passengers for an all-day trip Zbyszko of Old Orchard, Maine, ex-world champion wrestler, and his manager. Toward the close of the day we remarked to the latter that we noticed the famous athlete did not use tobacco, and his answer was "No, indeed, he does not even use tea or coffee." Here was a man of powerful physique, in middle life still the strongest man in the world because he had kept himself physically fit.

At Laverne, we received an ovation. Y. P. B.'s, L. T. L.'s and W. C. T. U. mothers to the number of one hundred were waiting when our train pulled in. Placing us in the center of their circle, the young people gave their yells and rally cries, and their welcome was so genuine that we forgot the weariness of travel.

Buffalo was our last point for work in the state before we turned our face homeward. Never shall we forget the good people who so hospitably took us into their hearts and homes.

Virginia News and Narrative

Special Correspondence

The W. C. T. U. float at the interesting and successful historical pageant, recently taking place in Richmond, came up to all expectations. It was draped in white with gold accessories. A trumpeter in Grecian robes, a large ribbon encircled globe, little children, and standards bearing inscriptions in plain lettering of the Child Welfare, Scientific Temperance Instruction, Loyal Temperance Legion and other constructive departments, were cleverly arranged features. For two days this float was in the procession of Virginia's progressive life of the present day, and attracted much attention. Many local unions are now listening to accounts of it from the lips of those who went to Richmond and eagerly watched for the white ribboners' representation.

Wherever she has been in the state, whether in the mountains or on the enthusiastic Eastern Shore, which is rich in history, wealthy in products and abounding in hearts of gold, a warm welcome has been given to Mrs. Emma Howland.

State organizer Justiss has been a busy worker since the state convention. The scene of her latest achievements is what is known as the Northern Neck section, near the Potomac and Rappahannock rivers, remote from railroads but with ever-present, delightful hospitality. Here she organized five new unions and revived a sixth. Her efforts have helped to advance temperance instruction in the schools, and steady progress is being made in essay work and use of the Temperance Day programs.

On June 13 Mrs. Faith T. Parrott began a six weeks' itinerary among the summer Normal schools of Tennessee, which will include Johnson City, Knoxville, Jonesboro, Nashville, Chattanooga and other places.

All the records are not yet in from the membership campaign, but progress has been made. The prize, a pearl pin, was won by Miss Mayme Jessup of the Clara Martin union of Charlottesville, fifty-one dues paid members having been won by individual effort during the three weeks. Chatham did good work also. Mrs. S. G. Bennett of that place winning twenty-four recruits.

Proud and joyous because of her forty-fourth anniversary, Mother Lincoln, on May 4, celebrated this event with accustomed neighborhood hospitality. Virginia was not organized till 1883.

The Cedar Falls man who just has received a patent on a still, is but an illustration of the common tendency to misapply energy and to use up our activities in futile endeavors. Had he been of a merchandising mind, he probably would have tried to sell refrigerators to the Eskimos, or furs to the people of the tropics.

Almost anybody with ordinary wit could have forseen the oncoming of prohibition far enough in advance to head off work on perfecting a liquor making machine, it would seem. For this was an open and above board still, one seeking the protection of the law, and not one for the moonshine trade.

But for that matter, the most of us saw the financial depression coming, discussed it day by day—and then stayed out in the wet too long.

The brewers and distillers were not much wiser than our Cedar Falls friend, for they, too, spent time and money and energy fighting off the inevitable, money that might now just as well be in the bank, time that could have been spent with profit otherwise, and good energy that was more than wasted.

One Hundred Thousand Stickers

Just think what that means when we say that one hundred thousand stickers announcing the great convention of the WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION have already been disposed of! One hundred thousand more are here waiting for you to use them. You are going to do your part in advertising this great event. The demand for stickers is increasing as the time draws nearer. So many activities lie dormant during the heat of summer, but at this season we frequently drop a souvenir postcard or write a little note to some one to whom we never write during the busy winter; just add a sticker and remind your friend of this great convention. Put one on your traveling bag; a sticker on your trunk will help you to identify it when it is piled up with the others.

Make a check for three dollars for a thousand of these stickers or if you only want a hundred send fifty cents to Mrs. James B. Scott, 503 South 46th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Enemy
Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb, wounded, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them. The doctor finds Angela ill and depressed, and at her request asks Fortescue to help his wife to resist her craving for liquor. Instead, he dismisses the doctor, and sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle, where she is easily led to take, first an alcoholized "medicine," and then the liquors offered by friends. After the birth of her baby she is given whisky until life is almost gone, when Dr. Scott, in Mussoorie for a hard-earned rest, is hurriedly summoned.)

CHAPTER XX.

That evening Fortescue arrived. Angela was the better for food and sleep, and smiled brightly upon him. She seemed to enjoy displaying the baby, who was dressed for the first time in an embroidered muslin robe and blue ribbons.

"Queer little kid!" said Fortescue, stroking the small head, with some pride, "not much like you!"

"Then he must be your image!" said Angela.

After a little joking about baby's immature features, Dr. Kathleen took Mr. Fortescue away.

"She is better, but in a very weak state still."

"Your telegram led me to think there was danger!"

"And there was, but it is averted for the time."

"I owe you thanks for your care of her —after my rudeness in Seraneb too!"

"Oh, don't speak of it; I am fond of your wife, and could do no less."

"Well! get her up as soon as possible. What do you give her as a tonic? A little good champagne would set her up!"

"Hush! Mr. Fortescue, you do not know what you say."

"Indeed, Dr. Scott," he said, stiffly, "I am in my right mind."

"Do you know what she is suffering from?"

"Yes, weakness after the birth of the child!"

"No! From poisoning by a deadly narcotic!"

"What!—who dare!" he said, in a furious voice.

"Her nurse and Mrs. Carlyle."

"Come, now! that is a little too much for me to believe."

"It is true! The nurse is a drunkard and administered alcohol in large doses out of her own whisky bottle, to keep her patient quiet."

"What an infernal idiot! Had Major Melcombe ordered any?"

"Yes, a small quantity, three teaspoonsful a day."

"And you have left this off?"

"Certainly! I absolutely forbid alcohol, and if you persist I throw up the case!"

"I suppose I must leave it to you, but I differ in thinking she would be better without a little stimulant."

"Listen, Mr. Fortescue! Your wife is in a critical condition; her brain cells are still heavily charged with the poison, and there is much irritation of the nerves. Her blood does not flow from the heart to the brain, as regularly as it should; thus, she is giddy and faint. If you persist in alcoholic treatment, heart-disease will supervene."

"Dear me, Dr. Scott, what a list of horrors! I fear you are an alarmist! Do you mean that there is disease?"

"I fear so."

"Can it be cured?"

"It can be retarded. Care and good food and total abstinence may check further symptoms."

"Thanks!" he said to her, "I hope you will carry out this program." To himself he said—"Hum! Exaggeration! I shall see Major Melcombe. I don't trust these 'women' doctors."

But Major Melcombe confirmed Dr. Scott's views and strongly advised Fortescue to leave his wife in her hands.

"If you wish her cured no one can help her better than Dr. Scott. I have the highest opinion of her medical knowledge and judgment."

So Fortescue left the next day, with instructions to Dr. Scott to do the best for his wife, and to accompany her down to the plains as soon as she was able to travel.

Dr. Scott had spent half her hard-earned holiday in attendance on Angela, and had but a fortnight left, but she was one who "entered into heaven by the noble road of pleasure in the good of others." She devoted herself to keeping Angela interested and occupied, feeding her well, and going out with her; above all in arousing her conscience, and awakening her sense of responsibility toward the child. The weather was supremely clear and invigorating, with brilliant azure skies and warm sunshine. October and November are the most pleasant months in the hills of India. Sunrises and sunsets are revelations of color; the snows show forth distinct in their magnificent outlines; giants of the Himalayas!—in dazzling white or glowing like crystal gold in the setting sun, the great intervening mountains flushed by indescribable tints of pink and mauve.

Dr. Scott took Angela daily in her rickshaw to see the wonders of the hills, —these mighty forests, snowclad mountains, sunlit rivers,—and did her utmost to direct her wavering attention to the great handiwork of God in nature, endeavoring thus to raise her thoughts above herself. She was anxious to convince Angela that there was a Saviour who was willing to be her friend, and daily she pleaded with her for a complete surrender to Him, as a power against her besetting sin.

Angela listened and acquiesced, and seemed convinced in her sweet yielding way, but Dr. Scott realized keenly her lack of mental strength.

The time came to pack up and be gone. Swiftly and methodically this was accomplished under Dr. Scott's direction. On the morning of their departure the bearer asked if he might keep Mem Sahib's bottles.

urer of the American Federation of Labor and never for one hour did I doubt that laboring men and women were benefited by total abstinence from alcoholic beverages. "Mem Sahib's bottles? What do you mean?"

The man asked her to come and see, and she went to the pantry. There stood a huge stock of "Virona" bottles.

Dr. Scott felt bewildered. "Had Angela drunk all this!" No wonder she had suffered in health, if for six months she had taken daily of a so-called "tonic" which was, in fact, a strong alcoholic drink!

She there and then made up her mind that she would write and speak constantly against the injurious compounds masquerading as tonics. It humiliated her as a woman to know that women are so easily persuaded into believing any and every lie employed by unscrupulous manufacturers to puff their secret nostrums; that it is mainly women who place their health, and even their lives, in the hands of those who violate the highest point of medical honor in keeping their decoctions secret for their own gain.

(For lack of space we are abridging the account at this point.—Editors.)

After his frugal dinner, eaten alone, Harford stretched himself in his long chair, his books beside him. He picked up one, read a page, and then his mind wandered to Kathleen Scott.

Suddenly he heard his name called from outside the door, and Angela came into the room. She swayed as she walked, and her eyes were dilated with a vague, uncertain look.

'Good heavens!" thought Harford, "I believe she is the worse for drink." Aloud he said, "I will send for a tikka garry to take you home." He hastened out and dispatched a man for the vehicle. To his questionings Angela returned incoherent mutterings, but he learned that she had been turned out of the Club. Seeing that she was in no state for remonstrance he brought her soda water to drink, and waited in silence till the long-awaited vehicle arrived. It was then twelve o'clock.

As they drove out of the compound two men passing saw them and laughingly greeted Harford.

At the door of Angela's home Divan Singh met them, and Harford asked, "Where is Mr. Fortescue?"

"He is out, Huzoor," was the reply.

Harford gave directions that Angela should be cared for, and turned away.

As two ladies sat chatting together in the Seraneb Club a few evenings later, Fortescue entered, looked around, then approached and asked abruptly, "Have you heard the rumor about my wife?"

They hesitated, but, upon a repetition of the question, finally admitted that they had heard that Angela had been seen coming with Harford from his bungalow one evening.

"It's all a lie and I beg you to contradict the rumor," said Fortescue, who looked haggard and tired, with a shrinking in his eyes never seen there before.

He left as abruptly as he had entered, and drove off to Harford's bungalow. Finding him at home, without a word of greeting, Fortescue asked at once, "Is this rumor true?"

"What rumor?"

"That my wife was at your house on Monday last?"

"Yes, that is true, but she was unconscious of evil; she was under the influence of drink," said Harford, quietly. "Your wife is absolutely loyal to you."

Fortescue angrily broke in, "What about you?"

"Before God I can say I have been guilty of no wrong word or act. I pity her as a victim of her environment."

"Her heredity, you mean to say."

"No, her environment, her surroundings in Anglo-Indian society and——"

"You had better not say it!"

"——And of her husband's selfish egoism."

Fortescue started forward as if to attack Harford, then checked himself, and left the room.

What Better Recommendation Do You Want?

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

"THE UNION SIGNAL is full of facts, arguments, suggestions, warnings and encouragements, and a union which does not keep in touch with the news of the whole country and of the world has little or no incentive for action and little food for inspiration and for life itself." These are the words of the president of the Connecticut W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary B. Wilson.

From Colorado's president, Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, comes the following:

"In campaigns, whether facts or bullets are used, the side which is best equipped, wins. Where are you going to get the information which will make women want to belong to the W. C. T. U.? Aroused feeling will not do it, unless sustained by facts and figures. THE UNION SIGNAL will supply the need and is indispensable for winning members and for the fall campaign. You can not even tell about the great work of the organization which you love and which you are trying to promote without THE UNION SIGNAL. Prejudiced or misinformed people will not be convinced of the fallacy of the anti-prohibition propaganda and our people will not realize the danger which threatens prohibition without the authentic up-to-the-minute information in THE UNION SIGNAL."

Nellie L. McClung, Member of Parliament, Alberta, Canada, writes us:

"A friend of mine has been sending me THE UNION SIGNAL this year, and I am writing to tell you how much I enjoy it. You certainly do send 'fodder' around so that any person can come and get a square meal. In our Sunday school we are following the plan of having some person speak for five minutes each Sunday, giving some temperance fact or some story that will stick in the memory of the children, hoping in this way to stimulate public sentiment in favor of our prohibitory laws."

This woman knows whereof she speaks. Read what she says:

"Rev. Peterson, who has been pastor of a Swedish Congregational Church in Worcester, Mass., for about fourteen years, has gone to Sweden to help in the prohibition campaign. He called me up to ask where he could get up-to-date facts regarding the benefits of prohibition, so that he would be able to meet the false statements that prohibition in America is a failure, circulated in Sweden by the liquor traffic. I told him THE UNION SIGNAL was the most up-to-date prohibition paper and would give him the facts he wanted and that the Scandinavian W. C. T. U. would send THE UNION SIGNAL to him in Sweden."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

PROHIBITION A SEPARATE UNIT PROPOSED — PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC SHOULD FOLLOW AMERICAN FLAG — PROHIBITION FORCES TO WORK FOR APPLICATION OF LAW TO SHIPS ON HIGH SEAS — INDEPENDENT CITIZENSHIP BILL PASSES HOUSE

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

The legislative program in the House and Senate appears to be emerging from a state of chaos and to be taking a definite form.

An agreement between legislative and executive branches has been reached to proceed in the Senate with the tariff before the bonus is brought forward. So slowly has the tariff bill moved that a demand is made by many for a new majority cloture rule to be applied on appropriation and revenue measures. Senate Republican leaders today put into operation their plan to curb debate on the tariff bill. A petition to invoke the existing cloture rule, which requires a two-thirds majority, was drafted by Senator Curtis, of Kansas, and its circulation has begun. Sixteen Senators only are required under the rule to authorize its presentation to the Senate. If the names of two-thirds of the members are not secured, Senate leaders declare a fight for a new rule to invoke cloture by a majority vote will be launched.

The House is expected to enter upon a season of three-day recesses July 1. Throughout July and a part of August the Senate will continue probably to struggle with the tariff, the bonus, and other less talked about measures, though perhaps as important, and miss its summer recess period. The Judiciary, the third branch of the government, has already shut up shop for the warm weather, and the judges are therefore on a vacation, Chief Justice Taft being in England, where he is receiving many honors.

Prohibition a Separate Unit Proposed

Senator Richard Ernst of Kentucky, and Representative William R. Wood of Indiana, have introduced in the Senate and House, respectively, bills to create an independent prohibition bureau, with a commissioner of prohibition at its head. There has been much discussion on where the prohibition enforcement activities should be placed. At present they are under the Treasury Department. The Ernst-Wood bills propose to make it an independent unit, out from under a Cabinet officer, and responsible directly to the President of the United States. The new proposal would create the office of commissioner of prohibition. The official title of the organization over which he would preside would be known as "the bureau for the collection of liquor and narcotic taxes and for the enforcement of prohibition," with an official short title of "the prohibition bureau."

Senator Ernst's Statement

"If the bill I have introduced is enacted into law," said Senator Ernst, "it will result in concentrating the prohibition work under one head, upon whom full responsibility will rest for enforcing the provisions of the narcotic laws and the prohibition enforcement acts and the collection and accounting of moneys collected as taxes and penalties.

"The commissioner of prohibition will have control of distilled spirits from the time they are manufactured until final disposition is made of them. He will supervise the collection of taxes and all other moneys received by directors, who will be required to give bond as collection agents similar to the bond now required of collectors of internal revenue.

"This bill, if enacted into law, will not mean the appropriation of any additional funds to enforce the prohibition and narcotic laws, but actually will result in a reduction of expenditures on account of the co-ordination of duties.

"I am convinced the bill would aid materially in speeding up the work, because instead of going through three or four divisions as the work now does, it will be passed upon by only one in authority who is charged with the responsibility of supervision. This will aid all along the line not only with respect to appointments, collections, compromises and adjustment of civil liabilities, etc., but will result in much closer collection of assessments made for violations of the law.

"The dealings with the Department of Justice will be simplified because the contact will be only between the prohibition commissioner and the Department of Justice. There are many independent establishments now operating under the President, and if an independent prohibition bureau is created, it is not establishing any precedent, but will be in harmony with many other separate establishments which report direct to the President."

Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic Should Follow the American Flag

Is the prohibition law applicable to American vessels outside the three mile limit? The Department of Justice has ruled it is! The legal department of the Shipping Board has ruled that it isn't!! The question should be definitely settled soon by absolute ruling of the Justice Department, or by Congressional action. The clear intent of the Eighteenth Amendment is to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors on United States territory. We believe the prohibition enforcement act passed by the Congress to make effective the Eighteenth Amendment is applicable wherever the jurisdiction of the United States extends, and includes American ships on the high seas.

The attention of the public has been directed to the situation by one who desires modification of the Volstead Act. Mr. Busch presents the situation as evidence in support of the contention of the liquor interests that "this Government is acting the part of a hypocrite in the enforcement of the prohibition law, that the law is in fact non-enforceable, that if it were enforced it would mean an economic loss and that public sentiment is against its enforcement."

The intent of Mr. Busch to create sentiment for wine and beer is evident in the statements made public by him in connection with this attack. The first document published by Mr. Busch had in it this as its climax statement:

"We believe that the train of evils resulting from the prohibition laws and their non-enforcement would be effectively remedied by the liberalization of the present Volstead Act to legalize the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. We think an investigation of those countries which have adopted a light wine and beer program will convince the most skeptical that this is the practical and effective road to true temperance—the reduction to a minimum of law violations, and of intemperance to practically nothing."

The second, entitled "Prohibition Afloat," discloses the motives of the document in the last lines. These read:

"Since it has utterly failed to remedy the evils aimed at, we respectfully suggest that the time has come when the law should be rationally amended so that it may be fairly administered in the interest of the general welfare of the nation."

Mr. Busch attempts to float his wine and beer propaganda with an appeal for law enforcement. In this we will not be deceived, but from the kettle and pot phase of it, may result a final settling of the question.

Prohibition Forces Will Work for Application of Law to Ships on High Seas

The prohibition forces will work for application of the Volstead Act to American ships on the high seas, and will favor adoption of a law to exclude all foreign ships selling or possessing beverage intoxicants on the high seas from entering our ports, so far as it is legally possible to do so. The extending of the jurisdiction of the United States beyond the three mile limit far enough to make it impracticable for rum running vessels to conduct their traffic will be favored.

Independent Citizenship Bill Passes House

The Cable bill to provide for separate independent citizenship and naturalization of women passed the House Tuesday last by a vote of 269. The bill goes to the Senate. As outlined by Congressman John L. Cable of Ohio, who was sponsor for the bill, it contains five propositions:

1. Under the present law an alien married woman cannot be naturalized independent of her husband. The first paragraph of the bill permits such an alien married woman to be naturalized without the naturalization of her husband.

2. Under the present law, when an alien woman marries an American citizen she automatically also becomes an American citizen. The present law does not require her to be able to speak the English language, to know anything about the laws or Constitution of our country; she is not required even to take the oath of allegiance. This bill abolishes the automatic naturalization by marriage and requires her to live in this country at least a year and she must first go before a Federal examiner and satisfy him that she knows the English language and is qualified to become an American citizen, and then her petition for naturalization is heard as is that of any other alien who is seeking to become an American citizen. She appears in court, renounces allegiance and fidelity to her foreign sovereignty and takes the oath that she will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States, and bear true faith and allegiance to the same.

3. Under the present law, if the husband of an alien woman is naturalized, the wife, by reason of such naturalization also automatically becomes an American citizen. Under this bill she does not acquire citizenship by reason of the naturalization of her husband, but may become an American citizen as explained in the above paragraph.

4. When an American woman now marries an alien the law of the United States provides that she shall take the nationality of her husband. Under this bill a woman citizen of the United States shall not, after the passage of this Act cease to be a citizen by reason of her marriage, unless she makes a formal renunciation of her citizenship before a court having jurisdiction over naturaliza

Northern Baptist Convention Passes Resolution On Prohibition And Law Enforcement

The Northern Baptist Convention, at its annual meeting in Indianapolis, went on record as strongly backing all aids to enforcement of law, particularly of the prohibition law. The resolution passed reads as follows:

"We favor the strict and impartial enforcement of the Volstead law. The violation of the liquor laws, especially by members of the so-called influential classes, breeds a contempt for all constitutional and statutory authority and is a potent factor in the spread of the lawlessness which in many great centers of population menaces American institutions. We urge also the enforcement of all laws whose infringement imperils our right to a day of rest and worship. The commercialized Sabbath is a foe to the health, morality and happiness of the American people."

The convention passed other resolutions on certain lines, among them industrial relationships, child labor, racial justice, and the abolition of war, the last named petitioning our national government to co-operate with other nations in the effort to bring about a stabilizing of world conditions and permanently banish war.

Respect for Constitution of United States Imperative

"Men who win success in the sharp competitive field of automobile manufacture need to be wide awake, practical and progressive," says the Spokane (Wash.) Chronicle of recent date. "Vice President Scott of the Reo Motor company of Lansing, Michigan, may be assumed to have these qualifications, judging by this statement from him: 'If the citizens of the United States would demand that the Constitution be upheld, and that those who are un-American enough to disregard our Constitution were given the treatment that they deserve, it would not be long before there would be just as much respect for the Eighteenth Amendment as there is for any other part of the Constitution of the United States.'"

Slump in Juvenile Crime

"Work of the Union League Boys' club has resulted in a reduction of 81 per cent in juvenile delinquency in Chicago between 1919, before the club was organized, and the end of 1921, the second year of the club's operation, according to the annual report issued by the club," says the Chicago Tribune. "The estimate is based on Juvenile court records."

Saloon Man Put Under $1000 Bond to Obey Dry Laws

The government won its first legal step in Philadelphia to close a saloon for a period of one year on the grounds that continued violations of the Volstead Act constitutes a nuisance, according to the Philadelphia North American, when Federal Judge Thompson issued a temporary injunction recently restraining John B. Heilman, a saloonkeeper, from further violations of the prohibition law. He also was ordered to enter a bond of $1,000 that he will obey the injunction pending a hearing by the government to close his place of business for a period of one year.

The case against Heilman is the first instituted in the Federal court in this city under the prohibition law. Similar action is pending against another saloonkeeper, the first to be sent to jail on conviction of violating the Volstead Act. His saloon has since been raided by prohibition agents, who declared they procured liquor there.

A New American Citizen

Introducing Mrs. Peter Oleson, Senatorial Candidate from Minnesota

"I want to protect the home—the children in the home," declares Mrs. Anna Dickie Oleson, Democratic nominee for the United States Senate from Minnesota, as quoted by the press. Which words would insure the interest of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, "organized motherhood" in her candidacy. But the eyes of the organization were first fastened on Mrs. Oleson just about two years ago, when, as a delegate from Minnesota to the Democratic convention in San Francisco, being given time by Mr. W. J. Bryan to speak on the dry plank which he submitted to the convention as a minority report of the resolutions committee, she made an appeal for it straight from the heart, warning the delegates against a retreat from the prohibition stand which had been taken by the nation. There is no question as to Mrs. Oleson's attitude in regard to this subject, and that by her election the dry forces would have in the Senate a friend worth while.

One reporter found Mrs. Oleson with duster and scrubpail "resting up" from her activities by cleaning house before going into the field again for the election campaign. Asked for a statement of the legislation in which she was most interested, her answer proved her deeply in sympathy with the aims and work of the W. C. T. U.

"The welfare of the children is more important now than any other job the women of the country can undertake," she said.

"The fight for women's rights is won; the great thing now is to help the children with better laws to protect them, better educational facilities.

"The woman in office can do a lot toward cleaning up politics, and that is what I am going to strive for.

"If I am elected, I will try to manage governmental affairs like a good housekeeper would manage her home: a good housewife keeps her house spotlessly clean, and I am going to try to keep legislation in the same condition.

"Clean legislation that benefits the masses is the only thing that can improve the country. Neither reactionary nor radical legislation is going to do any good in the long run, as both factions base most of their arguments on property rights.

"I am more interested in the fortunes of oppressed men, pitiful women and children than all the property rights on earth."

San Francisco Club Women Pledge Co-operation in Enforcement

The members of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce a few weeks ago endorsed a wine and beer resolution, apparently to confuse the enforcement issue in the coming election in the state. But they reckoned without the women, who are familiar with the Eighteenth Amendment and the constitution of California, and realize the need of enforcement acts. According to the San Jose (Cal.) Mercury-Herald of June 5, the San Francisco City and County Federation of Women's clubs promptly endorsed the Wright Act and pledged co-operation in a campaign to make clear the enforcement issue. "This federation is formed by the association of ninety-two women's clubs, whose members aggregate more than 10,000, and who represent the intelligence and public spirit of the womanhood of San Francisco," says the Mercury-Herald. "It is an organization no less civic in spirit than the Chamber of Commerce. It speaks, not for religious, ethical or fraternal societies, but for the community at large." The attitude of the members of the Chamber of Commerce, who, insofar as the Eighteenth Amendment is concerned, seem not to have grasped the point that they have a civic responsibility toward it, is then vividly contrasted with that of the women, who are viewing the situation, not as prohibitionists or anti-prohibitionists, but as citizens whose duty it is to uphold the Constitution of the United States, and on whom devolves the obligation "not merely to passively submit to laws, but to assist in enforcing them."

Drunkenness a Negligible Factor in Charity Cases

Press reports state that the Society for Organizing Charities in New Haven, Connecticut, finds that its statistics show that in 1919, of all the cases handled, 13 per cent had intemperance as a contributing, if not the chief factor, in the destitution of the family. In 1920 the proportion had dropped to 7 per cent, in 1921 to only .3 per cent, while thus far in the present year it has been negligible.

PROGRESS AND PERSONALITIES

GAINS OF WOMEN IN INDUSTRY AND WHO WON THEM

Probably the title ought to read, "Progress Through Personalities." Just now the daily papers are full of stories of athletic records broken. Illinois University—or was it Ames or California?—has set a new world high mark. And always there's the picture of the clean limbed youth who has lived straight and striven with every ounce of his energy. So every goal we've won means a devoted woman, and then another loyal woman, and finally a dauntless group, that have prayed, and sung, and gone forth to conquer in the name of prohibition.

Have you seen the "Loyal Patriots" on the cover page? They're worth knowing!

This union of employed women was organized in Huntingdon, Pa., on March 3. Mrs. Florence H. Myers, county president, and Mrs. Azuba Jones, department organizer, got permission from the authorities and visited the silk mill girls briefly at the noon hour for three days. The "Loyal Patriots" have a membership of twenty-two, with Mrs. Ella M. Funk, president. The picture was taken just after the noon-tide hour of prayer. The members had requested that they be permitted to remove their working clothes before the white ribbons were pinned on, so they might be sure of doing honor to its standards. That's the sort of loyal patriots they are! Mrs. E. S. Geist, state superintendent, expects other counties to organize Women in Industry unions.

PENNSYLVANIA claims another union composed of women in industry, organized in Huntingdon, February 28. Mrs. Myers, who is also wife of the dean of Juniata College, invited the college help to meet in her home. Mrs. Jones outlined the work, and Mrs. Hattie Lister, one of the nine members, who had been a white ribboner for years, was elected president. They chose as the name of their organization, "Second to None," the slogan used by Huntingdon county in their Jubilee campaign. "Each union," says Mrs. Jones, "seems strong and lusty, with prospects of developing into a splendid union under the protection of the county president."

Have you entered the W. I. I. Picture Contest?

The two pictures in this issue are good entrants.

NEW JERSEY is the latest state to win a special Women in Industry Membership Poster for state headquarters. The state president, Miss Esther H. Elfreth, on June 15 sent in her pledge to work to the slogan, "In Every Three New Members, One Woman in Industry Member."

Meanwhile, New Jersey has had the campaign presented at a dozen institutes and public meetings by the state organizer, Mrs. Emma H. Chase. She uses the film "When Women Work," and the national department exhibit to increase interest. Her last letter mentioned four appointments in the week to come. Has any other state so good a record?

OKLAHOMA has laid careful plans for a union of the employees of a Tulsa laundry. The proprietor offers a gift to the treasury of $1.00 per member secured, $75.00 maximum. The organization meeting is to include the following program:

1. Songs (two—familiar to all).
2. Prayer.
3. Work among Women in Industry.
   Mrs. Randolph Elliott, state superintendent, W. I. I.
4. What Does the W. C. T. U. Stand For?
   Mrs. A. H. Buhl, state president.
5. Song—"My Country, 'Tis of Thee."
6. Why You Should Join Five Hundred Thousand Women Belonging to the W. C. T. U.
   Mrs. G. W. Kesselering.

IN ARKANSAS the state superintendent, Mrs. D. M. McGraw, recently celebrated her golden wedding anniversary. Despite family duties, she has written "bushels of letters" to presidents and personal acquaintances throughout the state, talked to groups of employed women, placed our posters in the Fort Smith Y. W. C. A. and Welfare House, written articles for the papers, and arranged a night meeting at Greenwood. Here the poster exhibit was shown, with the report, "a fine meeting."

IN MISSOURI the campaign for a minimum wage law is being largely directed by our own splendid Mrs. Burger. Since her fine report in THE UNION SIGNAL of June 1, Mrs. Burger has presided over the first public hearing for employers. And the United States Women's Bureau, invited by the governor of Missouri, has commenced a survey of the cost of living.

NEW YORK state holds the honor for letters sent out in support of the Women in Industry membership drive—650 letters from the national director and an equal number from the state superintendent, Mrs. Harriet Doyle.

Through Mrs. Clowe, vice president the Schenectady union sends in a picture furnished by the General Electric Company, to show where some of the union employed members spread the seeds of law enforcement sentiment.

TEXAS is proud to have lost its first superintendent of Women in Industry, Mrs. Claude D. Watts! She was elected state president at the recent convention! Mrs. Josephine Collins, new superintendent, was a Women in Industry expert long before the National W. C. T. U. adopted the department. Her regular job, of journa

Has Prohibition Had a Beneficial Effect Upon the Family Life?

State Boards of Charities Report Beneficial Results Because of National Prohibition

Oklahoma Reports Decrease in Divorces Due to Drink

"I have been in this state twenty-two years," writes William D. Matthews, commissioner of the department of Charities and Corrections for Oklahoma, "and I have been a state official nearly eight years, and I do not hesitate to say that state and national prohibition have proved a blessing. The number of complaints for divorce on the ground of drunkenness has decreased wonderfully, I am safe in saying from 65 to 75 per cent."

Reduction in Alcoholics Admitted to Wisconsin State Hospitals

"The most noticeable effect of prohibition in Wisconsin that has come to our attention is the lessening in the alcoholic admissions to our state hospitals for the insane," is the statement of H. W. Williams, statistician for the State Board of Control for Wisconsin. "During pre-war times, 15 per cent of all male admissions to our hospitals for the insane were suffering from alcoholic insanity, the high water mark being reached in 1917, when over 20 per cent of all men admitted were so affected, which meant that every fifth man admitted was alcoholic. Since then there has been a steady decline in the number of these admissions. In 1918 it was 11.5 per cent; in 1919, 7 per cent, and in 1920, 2.7 per cent and for the year 1921, the same remarkable showing has been made."

President Harding Has Said: "The liquor traffic was destructive of much that was most precious in American life. In every community men and women have had an opportunity now to know what prohibition means. They know that debts are more promptly paid, that men take home the wages that once were wasted in saloons; that families are better clothed and fed."

Fewer Stranded Men Are Seen

"There has been a marked decrease in the number of stranded men who had to be cared for in the Helping Hand Institute, and there has been a striking improvement in certain families cared for by the Provident Association," writes L. A. Halbert, executive secretary of the Council of Social Agencies of Kansas City, Mo.

Workingmen Are Buying Automobiles

"By observation we know that prohibition has worked wonders for industry and the homes of America," asserts Ed. L. Thomas, president of the Thomas Grate Bar Company, Birmingham, Ala. "It makes no difference how distorted one's mind is, what we see speaks so loud that we cannot hear what the advocates of liquor say. For the workmen are buying automobiles, homes, good clothes, substantial food, are enjoying life, are better citizens, better fathers and better husbands than under the wet regime. The women and children have more and are happier."

Employes are Saving Money to Buy Homes, Testifies Big Business in Manufacturers' Record

"There is more interest taken in home life, which is reflected in a greater number of men paying for their homes, improving its furnishings, providing better shoes and clothing for their little ones. The attendance at both public and Sunday schools has improved," testifies N. G. Spangler, general manager of the Jackson Iron & Steel Company of Jackson, Ohio.

"There is far less drunkenness and waste of time and money; there is greater steadiness among laborers, more saving of money, BETTER CARE OF THE HOMES AND CHILDREN OF THE MEN WHO FORMERLY SPENT FREELY FOR DRINK," declares J. W. Marsh, president of the Standard Underground Cable Co. of Pittsburgh.

"Since the abolition of the saloons in the Birmingham district, which antedated by several years the adoption of nation-wide prohibition, there has been a steady and marked improvement in the moral, mental and physical condition of the people, and no class has felt more beneficent effects than the laborers," is the statement of John W. Sibley, general sales manager of the Birmingham Clay Products Co., of Birmingham, Ala. "We have found these men have become more industrious, efficient and thrifty. Their living conditions have vastly improved; peace and happiness prevail as a rule in their family life, and the children are enjoying greater and better educational opportunities than ever before."

"As an employer of labor, it has been my province to watch the effects of prohibition upon our twelve to fourteen hundred people, and we find that the laboring man and his family have directly benefited in large degree by prohibition, in fact, more than any other class in America," asserts J. J. Phoenix, president Bradley Knitting Company, Delavan, Wis. "Better living, better clothing, cleaner and better social life, happier homes with more contentment, better and steadier workers, averaging more efficient and with less sickness and lost time, are some of the benefits to the workers and society in general."

"In our cotton mill interests, the old, old plea against child labor was that the old father would carry his family to the mill village, hire them to the mills and weekly or bi-weekly draw their wages and drink them up, debauching the family," states B. B. Comer, president and treasurer of Avondale Mills, Birmingham, Ala. "There was some truth in this but the truth went further and it was not only the cotton mill daddy but the daddies everywhere, the heads of families, the sons in families, the sons-in-law in families, and what greater curse can fall anywhere than liquor drinking in these. There is nothing which has so helped cotton mills as the effect of prohibition on the cotton mill families."

FAMILIES BETTER HOUSED, BETTER CLOTHED, BETTER FED SINCE PROHIBITION, IS TESTIMONY OF VISITING NURSE ASSOCIATIONS

It is the opinion of those of us who have been working in homes for a period of over five years that there is a decided improvement in conditions therein, although the violations of the Eighteenth Amendment are terrific and we know that many houses harbor stills. Yet we believe that conditions are better.

One of our older nurses reports, "In my visiting nurse work, I have found conditions very much improved since prohibition. Workhouses, jails and insane asylums are not nearly so crowded, and conditions in most homes are much improved. Children are better fed, clothed, and cared for. Wives of men who frequently visited saloons are not mistreated as they used to be.

"During a conversation with one of my patients about the results of prohibition, she said, 'It is as different now as night and day.' She said she feared if saloons had continued she would have had to go to the insane asylum because the last time she was pregnant, her husband came home drunk nearly every night and abused her. He is now a different man and life seems well worth living. She hopes the saloons will never open again.

"Mrs. C.'s husband spent most of his time in the workhouse before prohibition, but since, he never comes home drunk and their home life is much happier."

ALMA C. HAUPT,
Superintendent Minneapolis Visiting Nurse Association.

On the whole we feel that prohibition has had a favorable effect on the home life of the industrial members of our population. We have had certain very striking instances of this fact.

KATHERINE TUCKER,
Superintendent Visiting Nurse Society of Philadelphia.

It is impossible at this time to give any statistics regarding the benefits of prohibition, but we (the Visiting Nurse Association) would like to go on record to the effect that as a public health organization we have found our various families whose husbands formerly spent at least a part of their pay envelope for drink have been better housed, better clothed and better fed since the Volstead Act. As a consequence this higher standard of living has reduced materially the cause of sickness. However, on account of the great prevalence of unemployment this past winter our families have suffered from sickness and other effects due to a low economic standard.

GLORY H. RAGLAND, R. N.,
Director of Nurses of the Visiting Nurse Association of St. Louis, Mo.

Miss Anna D. Ward, Baltimore general secretary of the Family Welfare Association, says: "Family welfare workers already see the benefits derived from prohibition and people are misinformed who say that prohibition is increasing dependence among the poor. The next generation will not crave strong drink."

INTOXICATING LIQUOR IN SANTO DOMINGO

SHALL THE UNITED STATES PERMIT A RETURN OF LIKE CONDITIONS?

Estil Critchie

Those who advocate a return to the days when liquor was the supreme arbiter in many American homes would do well to make a trip to Santo Domingo and, as an outsider, view carefully the results of the wide use of alcohol. Liquor, both domestic and imported, is on sale wherever there is room for arrangement of stock, and whoever has the wherewithal, without regard to age or sex, is privileged to buy. Every holiday, whether national or religious, is the signal for unrestrained drunkenness. Long after bedtime on the evening before the holiday, even high-ranking native officials may be seen in the most public of places, swilling beer and wine and maudlinly embracing total strangers whom, in sober moments, they would coldly ignore as undesirable. Vile language issues from the lips of the very people to whom the ordinary folk are wont to look for guidance; all delicacy (and to the Spaniard delicacy is one of the prime requisites of the lady or gentleman) is forgotten in the lust for alcoholic satiation. Women and men drink publicly together and, as the deadly fumes go more and more to their heads, do things which in their saner moments they would not even think of attempting. The holiday dawns with the reveller still in bed storing up his strength against the evening's further swilling.

Shall Our Boys Return to Like Surroundings?

Children, many of the fretting ones soothed with alcohol instead of sweet, wholesome milk, grow up on the streets within plain sight and easy hearing of vile groggeries and it is little wonder if in this way they gain knowledge which no child should ever acquire, except in the proper way, from the lips of its own parents. Nor is the groggery the only thing with which the child is familiar; for the unmentionable annex of the groggery—ancient of origin—old as the sexes, is open to the world. The child can lie awake in his own bed at home and listen to the hideous revelry by night as it issues through the open door. He sees his own father and mother stagger under the influence of rhum d'Haiti, and even though they may refuse him, it is but natural that he, boylike in his fondness for imitation, will seek clandestinely a little of the liquid pleasure which has made them apparently so happy; or failing in this, will, at an all too early age, seek like enjoyment openly. With his vivid, boyish imagination, the very least he can do is to ponder upon all he sees in a way that will not tend toward his mental health.

Shall Our Girls Develop in Like Environment?

And what of the girls, the future mothers of the Dominican people? Going about freely with the boys, many impure things are, of course, poured into their ears, and, protected only by the natural delicacy of the feminine instinct, rudimentary at most in the very young, they can but be injured morally. Even the very young develop the bold and knowing stare of the over-sophisticated, and use it indiscriminately on the passersby. Though all this may not be the result of liquor, that is assuredly the prime cause, since its use is nowhere barred, even in the home.

To be specific, I know of one place run by a man who is almost white, where all available space is crowded and no limitation is put upon what one may drink, except lack of money, or of capacity. Men sprawl over the tables, among empty beer and wine glasses and bottles, or mumble drunkenly, while children move about and gaze upon the scene with eyes that see everything. Perhaps the mother herself is engaged in intimate conversation with some other woman discussing matters concerning which no boy or girl should have knowledge.

A Leveller of All Ranks

My home is near a main road and many an evening have I sat in the moonlight on the piazza and watched men and women stagger by, singing maudlinly, and with arms around each other. Some would be dragging friends whose feet would not carry their owners. Others would lie untended in the dust of the roadway, running every possible chance of being run over and killed by passing automobiles. I have also seen men, at other times the best of friends, brought to jail, two at a time, with faces and bodies slashed with knives from fighting; and once a man in the most virulent stage of smallpox lay drunk near the roadside, a menace to all who came near him, and, therefore, untended.

Because of such things, the Haitian is the best of arguments against liquor. But one good look around should remove all necessity for argument. Is there an American father or mother who, in the light of the past, could anticipate with pleasure a return to an atmosphere just as unhealthy for the boy and girl as tha which I have here pictured? Can th mother and father think of their childre in the places of the Dominican childre spoken about? White people are mor enlightened, perhaps; but liquor level all ranks and lowers all standard whether the drinker is black or white and, relatively, induces the same un healthy thoughts in the minds of all wh imbibe. People who may not be all tha they should be, privately, will, under th influence of liquor, bare their secrets t all who pause to listen.

The Home Where Rum Is

The craving for liquor induces th father to divert much needed funds fro use by his loved ones, and this fact i nowhere better evidenced than here where one may see a father, with clothe torn and ragged from constant wea stagger openly into his own gateway an brush aside roughly his own childre who are equally ragged. And many listless and disconsolate-looking chil in homes such as this, bears the mark o undernourishment.

This article is a compilation of fact stated plainly and without unnecessar embellishment, and those who care to d so, may easily prove the contentions mad The writer only hopes his country ma never again return to conditions such a obtain here under a liquor regime an as the father of two children, I spea from the heart!

What Is 100 Per Cent Americanism?

"A 100 per cent American is a God-fearing citizen who believes the principles of Christianity are inseparably linked with the principles of Americanism." This is the opinion voiced by—a church paper?—no, by a small sheet, published by the Linograph Company of Davenport, Iowa, called The Slug. That paper answers the question, "What is 100 per cent Americanism?" by saying that the 100 per cent American is true to the principles of our government, takes an active interest in all that pertains to it, votes as his information and conscience dictate, abides by the laws that are enacted, and when he opposes those he thinks are wrong, he "fights fair," not as a bolshevik.

The editor continues:

"There are many men who would bitterly resent any questioning of their Americanism on any ground, who in private, and sometimes in public, violat and very emphatically voice their di approval of the prohibition law, con monly known as the Volstead Act.

"They have the right as good Amer can citizens to disapprove of this law or any law; they have a right to us their influence to have it changed; bu they have not the right to break th law, simply because others are doing without being punished.

"The more prominent a man is; th more influence he has; the more e perience he has, the more serious is h offense against the law. Many of ou wealthy men violate the Volstead A and are not punished, not because the can't be reached by the law; but becaus the legal machinery is occupied in reac ing other and more flagrant offender

"These men overlook the influence their example. They are as a rule goo citizens and their crime is one of thought lessness and selfishness more than an thing else. They continue to break th law because of the tang there is in d feating a regulation. When you di cuss it seriously with one of them h admits it is wrong; but he feels th 'others do it, why shouldn't I?'

"There are at least four good reason why they should not do it, even if othe do.

1. It is breaking an American law
2. It leads others to break the law.
3. Breaking this particular law fr quently leads to more serious crimes.
4. It is un-American to be a la breaker. In other words, a lawbreak cannot be a 100 per cent American."

Citizens, would ye be free? First of all, love God, love your neighbour, love one another, love the general welfare; and if ye have this love and union among ye, true liberty will be yours.

WORLD-WIDE FRIENDSHIPS

CHILDHOOD'S BRIDGE ACROSS THE SEA

Back in the "war-time" days of 1917, children in all parts of America eagerly demanded that they be given some part in the almost universal effort to "help win the war." The value of all this energy was quickly realized, the young enthusiasts banded together under the name "Junior Red Cross," and by February, 1919, eleven million children were enrolled in the Junior American Red Cross, and their production was valued at more than ten million dollars.

At the end of the war came the natural reaction; when people gladly dropped war-thoughts and war-work, the Junior Red Cross membership greatly decreased. But the movement had acquired too great a momentum to stop; and as soon as Red Cross workers overseas called for help for European war-waifs, the American Juniors sprang to their colors. Since then the organization has maintained a steady growth and efficiency.

Record of Relief Work Reads Like Romance

Although its home program includes relief work, civic training, community service, health education, and general helpfulness, it is the foreign work which gives color and romance to the Junior activities. Through the National Children's Fund, which is raised by group activity of the school children, such as entertainments, sales, school gardening, and individual savings and sacrifices, thousands of destitute European war-waifs have been fed and clothed and taught and loved back to healthy childhood. The record of this rescue work is full of stories and incidents that read like romances.

In Montenegro, where Junior representatives turned an old Turkish palace into a home for friendless children known as the Magic Palace, there occurred soon after the end of the war a toy riot. Children all over the country-side heard that there was to be a distribution of toys and crowds of youngsters stormed the gates of the Magic Palace. Some of them had not seen a toy for four years; the younger ones had never seen them. Fortunately the supply was large enough and no one was sent away empty-handed.

Junior Red Cross Workers Both Give and Receive

Two Albanian boys, who had no money, journeyed one hundred miles on foot to reach the vocational school maintained in Tirana by the American Juniors. They were taken into the school and are getting the education which many Albanians value more than home, or even food.

Many an American youngster would like a taste of life on the school-ships in Italy. Boys running wild in the streets are taken to live on two ships where they find a home, good food, and are trained to earn their living as fishermen and sailors. American Juniors help finance these school-ships.

France has similar vocational schools, except that there boys are trained to be farmers. They live the farm life and get both theoretical and practical training. Juniors have helped maintain many of these schools and have established a chain of little libraries, too, to provide the war-wrecked districts with the books they have been so long without.

On all the countries that suffered most from the war, the Junior American Red Cross has laid its healing touch. School gardens in Poland, well-equipped playgrounds in Belgium, soup-kitchens and open-air colonies in Austria, schools in Serbia, the health game in Czecho-Slovakia, these are only a few of the ways in which American boys and girls have been able to help less fortunate children. There is no feeling of superiority on the one side, nor humiliation on the other. Children's charity to children carries no sting. And since the establishment of a correspondence between the school children of various nations, the American children are "getting their money's worth" in an intimate and delightful acquaintance with remote countries and peoples.

School children in Cape Town, South Africa, for instance, sent to school children in northern Minnesota an album made up of photographs of town and school, carefully pressed native flowers, art work, and a letter describing the town, its historical places, life and customs. The Minnesota children will respond in like manner and so the friendship has begun. Toys made by the children are exchanged, also, and specimens of embroidery and handicraft. This sort of exchange is connecting far-distant places, changing into the home-towns of friends countries that were before only names on a map.

Knowledge and Friendship Supplant Ignorance and Indifference

"The mutual ignorance and indifference displayed by one part of the world toward the other," writes Lord Northcliffe in a recent newspaper article, "is the root of much of our trouble."

The children of the Junior Red Cross are digging up that root, for they are achieving a mutual knowledge and friendship. The letters and handiwork are a great shuttle, weaving children's thoughts and interests into a pattern of world-friendliness. And though American children began the work, it has been caught up by eager hands all over the world; England, Australia, Canada, Czecho-Slovakia, South America, Jugo-Slavia, Hungary, Austria, all have organized the Junior Red Cross, and before very long practically every country will fall into line.

The children of all nations are becoming friends.

Important Announcement In Regard to National Convention

It has been deemed advisable to hold the National W. C. T. U. Convention, as well as that of the World's W. C. T. U., in Philadelphia. The National meeting will immediately follow the World's gathering, closing on Sunday, November 19. The change has been made for several reasons, chiefly a desire to lessen expense of time, money and travel to our foreign guests and to delegates who are coming from long distances. By this arrangement, delegates and visitors who desire also to attend the convention of the World League Against Alcoholism in Toronto, will have a few days in which to visit New York City, Washington and Niagara Falls between the close of the National Convention and the Toronto meeting.

Change of Address

After July 1, 1922, the address of Mrs. Ella A. Boole, national vice-president-at-large, and honorary treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., will be 377 Parkside Ave., Brooklyn, New York.

Personal Mention

Among recent guests at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters from foreign countries were Mrs. Margaret B. Denning, former president of the India W. C. T. U., and Dr. Denning, her husband, Miss Maria Stenroth, national organizer for the Finland W. C. T. U., and Mrs. R. W. Bowey and Miss Florence Tossell of Adelaide, Australia. Mrs. Bowey's husband is president of the South Australia Band of Hope Union, and was appointed by the South Australian government to inquire into the steps being taken in this country to find other uses for grapes than the wine industry.

You Will Want These Leaflets For July 21!

Be sure to look in next week's UNION SIGNAL for two new program helps for Loyal Temperance Legion Day, July 21: "Uncle Sam's Prohibition Quiz" and "Aunt Columbia's Prohibition Quiz". The first, an exercise for ten young men or boys; the second, for ten young women or girls. They are just the leaflets you will need for your program July 21, and later for campaign meetings, institutes—short, "peppy" and to the point.

The Opportunity of Independence Day

There is no cut and dried method prescribed for the observance of Independence Day. There will be picnics and parades, carnivals and community gatherings, fireworks and fiestas. But whatever the program, there will be opportunities to stimulate true patriotism, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union should not fail to take advantage of the occasion. If a parade, there is always the chance for a W. C. T. U. or Prohibition float. If a program, see that the children of the Loyal Temperance Legion have a part. If a picnic, use the L. T. L. drinking cups, and distribute our telling "prohibition evidence" fans and campaign literature.

"No-More-War" Demonstrations

On July 29-30 ten nations of Europe and the United States will hold "No-More-War" demonstrations. This date is the week-end preceding the outbreak of the World War, and the demonstrations are for the purpose of "expressing the will of the people to end war forever." All societies interested in World Peace are urged to participate.

At a meeting of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, held this month, the following plan was suggested:

1. A "bombardment for peace" in the form of messages by mail, wire or radio, to the President of the United States and the Congress, expressing a willingness of the people to co-operate in the next step for World Peace.

2. The simultaneous posting of "No-More-War" placards on the morning of July 29, in the windows of homes and offices, on fences, trees, automobiles, street cars and in as many unexpected places as possible. These posters will be supplied free of cost by the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, 532 17th St., N. W., Washington, D. C. The National W. C. T. U. Publishing House also carries a fine lot of Peace Posters, which can be used effectively.

3. Ministers may be asked to co-operate by speaking on the abolition of war or Universal Peace, Sunday, July 30, and editors to assist by editorial or other references in their papers.

Local units of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a pioneer in the peace movement, will desire to co-operate in the "No-More-War" demonstration, in their respective communities.

The Eighteenth Amendment On The High Seas

Questions of vital import have been raised by the charge of Brewer Busch of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company that the Government is permitting the sale of alcoholic beverages on American vessels on the high seas, and the admission of Chairman Lasker of the United States Shipping Board of the truth of this accusation, explaining that if our merchant marine is to prosper such sale is necessary and that the course was legally justified by a ruling of the attorney of the Shipping Board that the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code did not apply to vessels outside of the three mile limit.

We are faced with the question: Are vessels operating under the United States Shipping Board and flying the American flag American territory? If they are American territory, of course the Eighteenth Amendment applies, and the Volstead Code should be made to apply if it does not at present.

To the mind of the average citizen, the case seems a plain one. Of course, ships of the United States Shipping Board are American territory. In this opinion he is upheld by the ruling of ex-Attorney General Frierson, who in 1920 held that the national prohibition law was effective upon ships flying the American flag wherever they might be.

As to the argument advanced by the Shipping Board "that American boats cannot compete with foreign boats in passenger service unless they are permitted to sell liquor," it remains to be proven whether the American public of the traveling class will place their appetites for alcoholic beverages above their desire to support by their patronage our American merchant marine. We would venture a guess that they will not.

Be that as it may, the vital question to the average citizen is not whether prohibition applied to the merchant marine will be a paying proposition but whether or not it is in accord with the great principle to which the people of the United States have committed themselves by the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Can we as a nation afford to relinquish or imperil our position of moral leadership among the nations by placing expediency before principle? Are we not bound by all the sacred traditions of the past to live up to the spirit of the Eighteenth Amendment in our international as well as our national relations?

Voices of 1,000 Children Stir Hearts at White House

Lenna Lowe Yost

One thousand school children who had gathered at the Lincoln Memorial to serenade the Chief Executive and wife, were invited into the White House out of the rain and storm. The historic East Room never witnessed a more picturesque sight than that presented by these flower-laden children with their joyous countenances.

The big moment for the children came after the singing was over, when President Harding spoke briefly to them. "I am glad to entertain so many of the boys and girls of Washington," he said, "and while none of us seemed to have influence enough to cause the rain to stop and the sun to shine, yet you children have brought lots of sunshine to the White House.

"In the year and two months Mrs. Harding and I have been in the White House, we have had many parties, but this is the nicest and sweetest we have ever had. I am glad it rained. Some of you may be a little bedraggled by it, but you all look beautiful to me.

"As I look at you I cannot tell from what homes you come, whether from palatial residences or homes more humble, but it makes no difference here; you are all welcome alike and I find in the scene before me a reflex of the equal opportunity of America.

"You have brought to the White House the sweetest music we have ever had here, for we never had any music better than the laughter of American childhood and nothing is sweeter to my ears. I only hope you have had some of the happiness you have brought to Mrs. Harding and myself this afternoon."

Military aides in their gold lace and splendid uniforms gave the only formal touch to the children's party.

President Harding once said that his hobby was to turn disappointment into hope. He achieved that the other day when the one thousand children, standing in the rain at the Lincoln Memorial, heard the magic words, "We are going to the White House to sing for President and Mrs. Harding." A foreign diplomat, watching the children trooping from the White House, said, "Now I know America is truly a republic, and a real democracy."

From a Woman's Viewpoint

Far and near have been heralded the remarks recently made by Elizabeth Marbury against the Eighteenth Amendment. A not enviable notoriety has been attained for her attitude and for the slogan adopted by the women whom she is leading in the drive for light wines and beer —"Wine for women."

Miss Marbury is well answered, however, by Idah McGlone Gibson, a newspaper woman, who, writing in the Los Angeles Express, from "The Woman's Viewpoint," gives full credit to Miss Marbury for her ability along various lines, but takes issue with her on the subject of prohibition. We quote in part:

"She has never, among her own friends, perhaps, seen any great hardship in 'Wine for Women' and yet Elizabeth Marbury should know—from her business as a broker in plays and as a producer of many successful Broadway musical comedies—that even in her own set 'Wine for Women' has worked incalculable evil.

"It was 'Wine for Women' that made Harry Thaw murder Stanford White, and in the last analysis Miss Marbury and her wealthy friends paid more for that wine in real money than they have probably paid for their own private stocks. The state of New York paid out incredible sums for that trial.

"It was 'Wine for Women' that caused the death of Jack de Saulles, one of the greatest wine buyers that was ever on Broadway.

"It was 'Wine for Women' that has caused some of the greatest defalcations in the financial circles of Wall Street, and it was 'Wine for Women' that has opened up the nastiest and most prurient scandal of modern times—the Stillman divorce case.

"If Miss Marbury will speak to the officers of the savings banks of the United States, she will find that their accounts have enlarged by leaps and bounds since prohibition. More children are wearing good shoes than ever before, and there are fewer cases of abuse in the domestic relations court."

Encouraging Outlook for Prohibition

That the outlook for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment is most encouraging is the opinion of Miss Georgia Hopley, the first and only woman general prohibition agent for Constructive Publicity, who with her sister called last week at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters. Every day brings reports of greater co-operation of state and city officials, the press, and private citizens with the Federal Government in bringing violators of the law to justice, and in educating the public to respect and observe the Eighteenth Amendment.

The Fiction of "Search and Seizure" Clauses

"It is queer how terrible a thing 'search and seizure' has become," says Chester Rowell in a recent article on prohibition printed in the San Francisco Bulletin. "There was a drastic search and seizure clause in the San Francisco blind pig ordinance, enacted at the request of the saloonkeepers to protect them against unlicensed competition. There is and for many years has been a search and seizure clause in the internal revenue act. The 'home' was not 'sacred' for those who committed the major crimes of unfair competition or of not paying their taxes. But it must be sacred for those who merely violate the Constitution of the United States.

"This sudden discovery of the Fourth amendment is a queer thing, anyway. Nobody thought the Fourth amendment was important when it should have protected the I. W. W. against the invasion of their premises and the search and seizure of their papers without a warrant. It was violated in all the I. W. W. arrests, and everybody applauded. We wanted one law enforced against them and we therefore denied them the protection of another. We violated it cheerfully to protect saloonkeepers and collect taxes. It was only when the Fourth amendment offered a way of obstructing the enforcement of the Eighteenth that anybody cared."

In sending money to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to THE UNION SIGNAL, or the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, please either send a draft or Chicago or New York, a postoffice money order, or add five cents to pay cost of exchange on checks or drafts on local banks. Cashier's or certified checks are not exempt from this charge, which is made necessary by the ruling of the Chicago Clearing House, through which all checks sent to us pass for collection.

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,

How Stop the "Crime Wave"?

In a recent address, Judge Kickham Scanlan of Chicago gave two reasons for the present crime wave, which are worthy of careful consideration.

"First," said the judge, as quoted by the press, "is the passing of the old American home of the past, and the second is the fact that the American public is losing faith in God.

"The old American homestead, with its training in religion, was the finest and best factor in keeping down crime this country has ever known. As an institution it is fast falling into decay, with a resultant increase in crime.

"In recent statistics issued by the government it was revealed that during the questioning of men for the draft two out of every three boasted they did not attend church. Such a statement is appalling."

A similar opinion was voiced by another judge, John F. Boyer, of Evanston, Illinois, in a talk on "What's the Matter with the Parents?" We quote a few sentences from the press accounts:

"The courts in this generation find more delinquents between the ages of fourteen and nineteen than of any other age. I do not mean to say that the standard of morality is on the whole so much lower than it was a generation ago, but the lapse in moral standards seems to affect the young in the present age much more than it did in our fathers' time. For this the parents are responsible. They do not exercise care over their children in measures comparable to the generation past.

"What has become of the morning prayer and the devotional exercises that we used to see in almost every home? Parents say they have no time for such things. But nature and the laws of cause and effect pay no attention to the speed of modern times. These same parents find that they some time have to take time to die.

"The children do not receive a fair chance to respect the demand made upon them by community, church, state, and even the law, on account of the moral laxity and lack of training by the parent."

Medical Temperance

Martha M. Allen, National Superintendent

Questions are again coming as to the use of Coca Cola. Some church papers are excusing their advertising of this drug drink by saying that there has been a change of formula which makes the drink all right. The change of formula is a lessened quantity of caffein in the drink. The vice-president of the company told me some years ago that they were obliged to use extract of coca leaves to hold the right to the name Coca Cola, but in the printed formula given in church papers there is no mention of coca extract. It seems to be covered up under the word "flavoring." This coca extract is the refuse of a cocaine factory, that is, it is made after all the cocaine is supposed to be removed from the coca leaves. If the women interested in the fight against this drink will read the article by Dr. Harvey W. Wiley in the Good Housekeeping magazine for May, 1922, they will find some enlightening facts regarding the government suit against the Coca Cola Company. Members of the W. C. T. U. should send to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Ill., for the new leaflet, "Drug Drinks," 60 cents per 100, and have it used in local unions and in institutes as a part of the program. It is in the form of questions and answers, and together with the leaflet, "Don't Drink Coca Cola," should be widely distributed, especially in schools and Sunday schools.

Except to pass a resolution to request the United States government to supply bonded whisky at a fixed retail price for such physicians as think they must use this agent as a medicine, the American Medical Association took no action on the alcohol matter this year at its great meeting in St. Louis. More and more physicians of the progressive type are laying aside alcohol in their practice, but they feel that as a large number of the profession still cling to belief in its value in sickness, such practitioners should have whisky that is less dangerous than that which is available in some localities. It is to be hoped that this action will not lead to a weakening of the laws of the twenty-two states which do not permit the sale of whisky for any purpose. It will be well for temperance workers to be watchful in this regard, as the liquor advocates may try to take advantage of the resolution passed by the American Medical Association.

The passing of the Jones-Miller Anti-Narcotic bill by both houses of Congress is matter for rejoicing. This measure prohibits the importation of narcotic drugs into the United States in excess of what may be needed for medicinal use. It forbids all exportation of such drugs, and it creates a Federal Narcotic Control Board to be composed of the Secretaries of State, the Treasury and of Commerce. If well enforced, this measure should curtail the traffic in habit-forming drugs very materially as the government report on them published in 1918 declared that about 90 per cent of the drugs imported into this country were used for other than medical purposes.

It remains to be seen whether the law will be construed to allow opiates in patent medicines. If not, it will be a great blow to the patent medicine trade which in so many cases depends on narcotic drugs and alcohol to deaden sensations of discomfort and so make the user think he or she is being benefited.

I hope sincerely that the leaflets of this department are being freely used. By scattering this literature wisely and often, every local union could advance the prohibition movement. Send to headquarters at Evanston, Ill., for the 30 cent sample package of Medical Temperance leaflets and select therefrom for programs and for distribution. And send also for leaflets on prohibition and utilize them to make votes for "dry" Congressmen this fall. We must continue to work earnestly. This is no time to cease our educative efforts.

My address for the summer is Long Beach, L. I., New York.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PUBLISHING HOUSE,
Evanston, Illinois

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life:

FORMER PRESIDENT PENNSYLVANIA W. C. T. U. TRANSLATED

One by one the comrades who laid the foundations of our work pass on to their reward. Among these honored white ribboners was MRS. MARY H. JONES, former president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. who also served at different times as vice-president-at-large and recording secretary and for many years as president of the W. C. T. U. of Philadelphia. In all these offices, her efficiency, consecration, courage and devotion endeared her to the women. She created the State Bulletin as a bond between the workers. The Willard W. C. T. U. Headquarters, 1921 Arch St., Philadelphia, through her generous support, has been a beacon light through the years. The memorial service, held in the Holy Trinity Church, of which she was a member, was conducted by Dr. Floyd Tomkins, and was attended by a large company of her white ribbon comrades. A message was read from Miss Anna A. Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U. Mrs. Ella M. George, state president, Miss H. Frances Jones, "a state comrade," Madam Layyal Barakat, and Elizabeth R. Ferguson, for the Philadelphia W. C. T. U., gave tributes.

"Life's lesson she had learned, had drained the cup
Of earth's experiences of smiles and tears
It was her time, then, gladly to take up
The higher labors of her grander years."

MRS. CAMPBELL PROMOTED

White ribboners are sorely bereft in the homegoing of MRS. VIE H. CAMPBELL, a pioneer of the Crusade days in Wisconsin for six years state president, and for about thirty years a National W. C. T. U. lecturer and organizer. Mrs. Campbell, who was born in 1846, practically lived her life in Wisconsin, spending many years on a farm near Evansville, where, through the study and practice of scientific farming, she became proficient in agriculture. At the same time she managed her household efficiently, reared her children well, and was ever ready to respond to community needs.

Early hearing the call of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and actively engaging in its work at a period when advocacy of total abstinence and prohibition often brought ridicule and persecution, Mrs. Campbell entered heart and soul into the "peaceful warfare" in which the organization had engaged. A woman of excellent qualities of heart and mind, being business like, methodical, industrious, versatile; imbued with high ideals, and having a vision of the responsibility of the individual Christian, she could but dedicate her life to God and the W. C. T. U., in whose ranks as a recruiting officer, she had enlisted many.

MRS. CAROLINE WIXON, of Beecher Central Union, Elmira, N. Y., at the advanced age of 101 years. Perhaps the oldest W. C. T. U. member in the state, Mrs. Wixon's comrades rejoice that she was so long spared to them.

MRS. MARY A. McCAFFERTY of the Carrollton (Ala.) W. C. T. U. An earnest worker who served the cause well, whose days were filled with charitable deeds, and who leaves a record of fidelity to God, the church, and her fellow beings.

MRS. REBECCA SCHOFIELD and MRS. AGNES WILLETTS, two of the oldest members of the Wheeling, W. Va., union. They had participated in the Crusade movement and were charter members of the W. C. T. U. Close friends and co-workers in church and temperance work, they were not separated long by death. Having passed three score years and ten, they have left a remarkable record of devotion to the cause.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

ONE HUNDRED DAYS IN THE GREAT NORTHWEST

Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. Secretary

To spend thirteen weeks in the Great Northwest of our wonderful country is a rare privilege, but when one is in the company of our W. C. T. U. and Y. P. B. workers, the joy is enhanced.

The first state visited on the "one-week-to-a-state" trip in the interest of the Million Members drive was Iowa. I had the pleasure of having with me Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, state W. C. T. U. president, and Miss Edith Smith, Y. P. B. secretary. Conferences were held in several towns; membership plans, as well as Y. P. B. interests, were stressed at every meeting. Audiences were uniformly large; receptions, luncheons and dinners, with honorary members as guests, were features of the trip. Interest centered in the election of dry officials as well as in reaching the membership goal.

In Lincoln, Nebraska, a "Mother and Daughter" banquet was held. The women, young and old, came together at meetings, at luncheons and conferences throughout the state. Mrs. H. T. McNickle, the newly appointed Y. P. B. secretary, accompanied me. It was her first trip through her state in the interest of the young people's work, and her enthusiasm made her a delightful companion. The work is taking on new life in Nebraska.

Colorado afforded many interesting experiences. Mrs. Craig, state superintendent of public instruction, had launched the prize essay work in all the schools. In almost every town I visited the schools and was always asked to speak on some phase of the work that those particular students were studying. Many social affairs were planned in connection with other organizations. In several of the universities I met students from foreign countries, and they were always interested in prohibition. At the close of an address at a young people's meeting, over 200 young people pledged their lives to the principles of the Young People's Branch and promised to live for Christ and America. At nearly every meeting I had with me at least one state officer.

In Wyoming, the vice president of the state W. C. T. U., Mrs. Minnie Fenwick, accompanied me on my trips. Here as everywhere there was much interest in the W. C. T. U. activities. Especially gratifying was the response from the young people. Two unions were organized in the state and new members secured everywhere.

Salt Lake City and Ogden were the points visited in Utah. There were conferences with W. C. T. U. leaders, public meetings, a busy Sunday, and many new members were added to the ranks and our work presented in schools and colleges.

In southern Idaho, I was fortunate in having with me Dr. Emma Drake, state president. The membership plans, under the direction of the "trio teams" were heralded with joy. Educators seemed always ready for a W. C. T. U. speaker, and aside from the regular programs of the conferences, the centers of education are always fertile fields for service.

Our Rally Cry

5,000 New Members, 500 New Branches, 500,000 Signatures to the Polyglot Petition.

In Oregon our work was mostly of a local nature. At Milton I met the students of the college and at Gresham attended the state executive committee meeting. In every community there were many new members gained and membership plans laid before them.

In West Washington, group conferences were held at every point. Schools and colleges were open for our message. Miss Mary E. Brown, state president, was with me for the whole trip, and Mrs. Lillie Coover, the new state Y. P. B. secretary, for a part of the time. Interest centered in the Polyglot Petition and the membership drive. Conferences were also the order of the day in East Washington, and opportunity was given to meet the fine women there.

In North Idaho distances are great, and towns far apart, but wherever one finds a group of women, there are sure to be some who are keeping alive sentiment for law enforcement and winning recruits to the white ribbon army.

In Montana I met Miss Theo Whiting, who is accomplishing wonderful things both in the department of Americanization and in organizing new unions. Mrs. J. E. Cocks, Mrs. P. W. Haynes, and Mrs. W. C. Dawes, state W. C. T. U. officers, accompanied me part of the time. Invitations to speak were received from clubs, colleges, and schools of all kinds. At Bozeman, Mrs. Dawes invited every student whose mother is a member of the W. C. T. U. anywhere in the state to be a special guest at a banquet. These fine young people accepted in great numbers; they also responded to toasts, and nearly every one signed the pledge placed beside each plate, and paid state dues into the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. If there are any mothers who are wondering what their children think of the W. C. T. U. and its influence on the home and the young folks, they should have heard the responses given at that remarkable banquet. I suggest that next year in every college town the W. C. T. U. follow the example set by Montana, and in this way make its influence felt in a new way.

The program for North Dakota was almost entirely in the colleges. It began with the Dickinson Normal school. At Jamestown, I visited the district convention, and at the college was the honor guest of the Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. at a luncheon. A temperance committee was established there and also at Valley City. At the latter place Mrs. S. A. Zimmerman entertained the outgoing and incoming cabinets of the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. At Mayville, I found our friend, Mr. Oscar Mehus, who has contributed frequently to THE UNION SIGNAL, in charge of the department of Social Science. This is his first year at Mayville. The prize essay work has been introduced and a temperance committee organized. I am more convinced than ever that there is nothing that pays so well and quickly as carrying our work into the schools and the colleges, where we come in touch with the young people who are soon to be in a position to lead out in the temperance reform.

In my whole trip 187 addresses were delivered, 459 new members gained, and there were organized four unions and three Branches, with several temperance committees in schools and colleges.

The personal worker for the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment was at work in many of the communities I visited, but the society will never gain its end, for as Frances Willard so often reminded us, "God is on our side." Never has there been more interest, it seems to me, in the work of the W. C. T. U. Women want to belong. If we had leaders there could be a Y. P. B. organized in every community. Many educators said to me, "Your program for the young people is the most constructive program of any of which I have heard." I know there is interest among the young people, and wherever it is possible to get the right kind of leadership, they can be organized and become a factor for holding our prohibition law, and working with all the energy and enthusiasm of youth for its observance and enforcement.

One hundred days of hard work, but it paid in aroused, interested, increased, membership and in young lives inspired to enter our work. I verily believe the states of the Northwest will reach their goal.

Why Not?

Why not arrange for out-door meetings during the summer months in co-operation with the other young people's societies, presenting such topics as "Why I am Proud to be an American"; What is Citizenship?; What Two Years of Prohibition Has Done for (a) My Town (b) My State (c) My Nation.

Prize Offer

An award of $10 will be made to the member of the Young People's Branch who submits the ten best reasons on "Why I am Proud to be an American." The articles must be not over 250 words in length and should be in the hands of Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, National General Y. P. B. Secretary, by August first. The full name and address must appear on each paper.

Mobilize a Million Members Continue the Membership Drive All Summer

A MEMBERSHIP CONTEST OF THE "STAY-AT-HOMES" FOR THE SUMMER. Isn't that a bright idea? It comes from Oklahoma, and this is what the live state president, Mrs. Josephine M. Buhl, says: "It is hot down here in the Oklahoma sunshine. Nevertheless our official force has decided not to take a vacation but to keep at the work until the year closes. I believe we will put on a summer membership contest. Nearly everybody goes to a cooler place for the summer, but those of us who stay at home might keep the good work going. I have one plan for the early summer, a Law Enforcement Week, July 1-July 8."

The state W. C. T. U. president has proclaimed a week of prayer and patriotism to be known as Law Enforcement Week throughout the length and breadth of Oklahoma, July 1-8, to be observed by public mass meetings, by children's entertainments, by sermons in the churches, by wide distribution of literature, by the placing of stars in the windows of hundreds of homes, and by creating sentiment by every possible means for the enforcement and observance of the law throughout the great commonwealth.

Flower Mission Day Observed at Frances Willard's Grave

An impressive memorial service, on Flower Mission Day, was held by the Cook County (Ill.) W. C. T. U. at Rose Hill Cemetery. The exercises were conducted by Mrs. W. A. Logie, county superintendent of Flower Mission and Relief Work. Flowers were placed on the graves of Mrs. Helen M. Barker, Mrs. M. B. Carse, Mrs. Jessie Brown Hilton, Mrs. Mary B. Willard, Madam Willard and Frances E. Willard. The decorations of roses and daisies placed in the urn at the foot of Miss Willard's grave, made a beautiful picture. Impressive and appropriate remarks were made by Mrs. Marjorie Clarno, county treasurer, Mrs. Izora Peake, county president, Miss Epha Marshall, corresponding secretary, and Miss Helen L. Hood, president of the Illinois W. C. T. U. The county musical director, Mrs. Alinda Bryant, in a clear, sweet voice, rendered several selections. This is the second year these exercises have been held and the county expects to make it an annual event.

Old System Dies Hard

Readers of Harper's Magazine have been expressing to its editors their opinions in regard to an article by Meredith Nicholson on "The Oldest Case on the Calendar," especially those paragraphs dealing with prohibition. One letter coming from a gentleman in Muncy, Pennsylvania, is particularly interesting.

"When Mr. Nicholson declares he would 'go back to the old system' (the legalized liquor traffic) he dubs himself an old-timer, contradicts his thesis, and loses step with the progressive youth of today. The 'old system' is an anachronism which the new day will not abide and which the new day is in process of relegating to the limbo of discarded nuisances fastened upon it by past generations. The 'old system' dies hard, but it is dying, thanks to the new-timer.

"Mr. Nicholson's belief that the prohibitory amendment and cognate laws 'have wrought more mischief than the evil sought to be abolished' is overwhelmingly negatived by the facts in the case. When he says such laws should never have been passed until the government had perfected a machinery for their enforcement he puts the cart before the horse. Any tyro in civil government could tell him that the only sanction for governmental machinery is a law which orders it.

"Despite pro-liquorites posing as prohibition agents, and all of the tricks of the 'wets' to discount and nullify the law, it is being enforced, and with an ever-increasing efficiency. The bootlegger, like a thief, is an outlaw, and he is an argument for, not against the law. Boys now, as under license, are protected by the law, but now, as then, it is the duty of good citizens to aid in law enforcement.

"The observation of Mr. Nicholson that more young boys were seen intoxicated in the last year than in all his life before must have been made in an extremely moist and lawless community. It is to be hoped that, for the sake of law and order, and particularly for the boys' sake, he did his duty as a good citizen to 'drain' the place."

Michigan W. C. T. U. Patriots Prepare For Year of Strenuous Activities

Myrta E. Lockwood

A tremendous program for the coming year was mapped out, during the five days of the meeting, by white ribboners attending the forty-eighth annual convention of the Michigan Woman's Christian Temperance Union, held recently in Muskegon. Reports teemed with records of achievements and plans for more work. Realizing that we face an enemy "thirsty for drink and hungry for spoil," the great outstanding job for Michigan is to mobilize our part of the million members; to work for the retention of the state enforcement law, the Volstead Act and the Eighteenth Amendment.

From the time of our entrance into the city, when the entire executive board were taken to the home of Mrs. Adolph Slettin, where a bountiful dinner was served, till the last good-bye, we felt the hospitality in the Muskegon air. The breezes from the great lakes, the white bows which pointed the way to the convention church, the greetings from city, church, board of commerce, schools and homes at the banquet the opening evening (when flowers in profusion marked the observance of Flower Mission Day); the long rides along the beautiful drives, all spelled "W-E-L-C-O-M-E." A wonderful privilege was granted Michigan this year. For the first time ever, the National Trio Team visited a state convention. Mrs. Frances P. Parks, national corresponding secretary, responded for the National, and was with us throughout Saturday in convention.

Saturday evening the Trio Team and Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of Child Welfare, were presented, and Sunday was a day long to be remembered, with Miss Anna A. Gordon, national president, speaking in the First M. E. church in the morning, Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, national treasurer, and Mrs. Parks addressing the great mass meeting Sunday afternoon in the auditorium of the Muskegon Heights school; and Sunday evening, when the Trio Team —Miss Gordon, Mrs. Parks and Mrs. Munns—each brought a forceful message which will thrill the hearts of Michigan white ribboners throughout the year.

Mrs. Munns was with us during Monday, waving her last good-bye Tuesday morning. Mrs. Margaret B. Platt, editor and promoter of literature, brought to attention from time to time the fund of literature Mother National offers us. Many "Star" cards and fans were sold to tell the story of loyalty to the United States Constitution.

Mrs. Perkins gave the last convention address Tuesday evening, following four-minute speeches from several state workers. She spoke on "Our Nation's Future," and we felt that in having present with us our national visitors Michigan white ribboners and the citizens of Muskegon had never been so favored. Michigan Federal Prohibition Director James R. Davis in no uncertain tones showed the needs, the outlook, and the way women can help in this critical period. A. C. Graham, field secretary for the Michigan Anti-Saloon League, spoke of the W. C. T. U. sentiment that has crystallized into the present law, showing the three hindrances to law enforcement, avarice—appetite—apathy; the three forces to work for victory, the law—officers—the people.

Mrs. Sarah McVeigh, for six years Muskegon policewoman and deputy sheriff, urged the enforcement of all law. Muskegon Night brought ringing words from Harry Jackson, prosecuting attorney, Archie McCrea, editor of the Muskegon Chronicle, and Mrs. Nellie Chrisholm, county commissioner of schools, who declared "The younger generation will play the symphony that has been in the hearts of the W. C. T. U. for years."

The keynote of the convention was "Lawbreakers should never be permitted to be law makers." As we saluted the flag the morning of the last day, June 14—Flag Day—we realized that the war-time slogan is still our slogan: "Patriotism prompts participation in a practical program."

The 1923 convention will be held in Adrian. The program of the new year will call for the best efforts of Michigan white ribboners. As we enter the whirlwind campaign for members we are saying:

"The best books haven't been written yet,
The best race hasn't been run;
The highest peak hasn't been climbed,
The best verse hasn't been rhymed yet,
The best song hasn't been sung.
The best house hasn't been planned,
The mightiest rivers aren't spanned,
The best jobs haven't been started,
The best work hasn't been done," and all are joining in the slogan given by the Sixth District:

"Good—better—best
We'll never rest
Till our good is better
And our better best."

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit. Admitting to her mother that she has yielded to her husband's insistence that she drink, she is told that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb, wounded, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them. The doctor finds Angela ill and depressed, and at her request asks Fortescue to help his wife to resist her craving for liquor. Instead, he dismisses the doctor, and sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle, where she is easily led to take, first an alcoholized "medicine," and then the liquors offered by friends. Returning to Seraneb, she continues to drink, and wanders to Harford's bungalow one evening, after being turned out of the club, thus becoming a subject for gossip which her husband hears.)

CHAPTER XXI

The next morning Fortescue lay long revolving in his mind the action to take regarding his wife's indiscretion. His pride was hard hit, he felt that he had been cheated of happiness, and that his prestige had been broken down. He excused himself of all responsibility, and had not a glimpse of his own shortcomings. It was with an effort that finally he roused himself to dress, and then sent for Angela.

She came in and sank into a chair in his dressing room without a word. Fortescue was startled to see how thin she had grown, and that her complexion was of a yellowish pallor, very different from the rose-bloom of eighteen months ago.

"I sent for you, Angela, because there is a rumor flying about that you visited Harford at twelve o'clock on Monday evening. Is it true?"

A trembling faintness ran over her, her eye-lids quivered, but she faced him. "Yes, it is true. I was drunk, and did not know what I was about, and he brought me home."

"Listen to me, Angela. You must leave Seraneb; I shall send you home."

"To America! To mother! I shall be only too glad to go. I and baby will get off as quickly as possible."

"You will not take the child!"

"Not take the boy! Then I shall stay." She sank back in her chair, and a deadly pallor passed over her face.

He thought she was going to faint, and felt alarmed at her looks.

"Come, Angela, cheer up; you shall stay for the boy's sake, but I must have a promise that you will give up the drink, and not speak to Harford again."

"Yes, yes, anything, Frank, but don't take baby from me. Help me to give up drink, put it out of our home, from off our table. I will refuse every invitation, every function! It is my only chance."

Fortescue stiffened, and his face grew gloomy. "I shall consider the matter, but I tell you, you ought not to expect this. You must learn to see others take it, and by degrees perhaps you yourself will learn moderation."

"Moderation!" She laughed wildly. "I am more moderate than you, Frank, and yet I drink to excess!" Then she fell on her knees. "Look here, Frank, your wife begs you to have mercy on her, and banish that which is killing her!"

"Nonsense, Angela; get up and don't be a fool!"

She arose and walked out without another word. Her heart seemed turned to stone. What a hideous, ignoble tragedy her life was!

She wrote a note to Dr. Scott, who came about one o'clock, finding Angela sitting in a darkened room.

"I'm not ill, Kathleen, but I'm a most miserable woman!"

"My dear Angela, is there anything troubling you?"

The sad story was soon told, and Kathleen tried in vain to comfort her.

"Kathleen, believe me or not, but the fact is, at this moment I am possessed by an all-devouring desire to drink. You had better leave me to myself. Do you know anything of the fire that burns in me? No, you cannot! My brain is all hot pulsation, I must be one to whom drink is a physical necessity. Let me go. If I sin I suffer! and it will soon be over."

"You are ill, poor child!"

"Ill, do you say? Yes! then give me my medicine. Alcohol will cure me!"

She shivered and cowered down; the dreadful wistfulness of her eager eyes, eager for the deadly drug, cut Kathleen to the heart.

"Ayah," she called, "fetch Mem Sahib's dress and hat; she is coming with me."

Angela started up with wild eyes. "Not without baby."

"Hush! baby shall come also."

Angela allowed herself to be dressed and conducted to the carriage. She clasped the baby close, and they drove away to the hospital.

"You can follow, nurse," she said to the baby's Ayah; "and bring his clothes."

Arrived at their destination, Kathleen administered a dose of soothing medicine, and induced Angela to lie down. The baby was laid by her, and Kathleen had soon the joy of seeing sleep creep over the poor, distraught, tempted woman.

Kathleen had the heartache. Not for herself, but for the poor young wife, against whom the world stood in conspiracy. Pity! divine pity! possessed her for this victim of the subtle, enslaving enemy, which lurked in every bungalow, at every feast, in every club of Anglo-Indian society! Cursed by an inheritance of inebriety, doomed all her life to struggle against the terrible craving, and at the last to succumb, she was not so much a sinner, Kathleen felt, as the husband who refused to shield his wife, and preferred self-indulgence in a luxury which is not food, and certainly is not a necessity, at such a cost! She had this morning carefully examined and questioned Angela and she found distinct advance in the disease she feared. The heart, delicate to begin with, showed degeneration in its muscular structure, the power of contraction was reduced by the strain laid upon it—the excess of work it was made to perform by alcohol. Six months of daily doses of "Virona" and her late indulgence had done an evil work, indeed!

Kathleen wrote to Fortescue, asking his permission to keep Angela. She required great care and absolute rest: this she could have in a private room at the hospital. The baby also should be allowed to stay as he was a great solace to the invalid.

She offered to send the boy daily to visit his father.

Fortescue replied that he was going into camp, and should be glad to have his wife and child taken care of. He sent a cheque for five hundred rupees, begging Dr. Scott to spare no expense. In truth he was glad, rather than otherwise, to be rid of the burden of Angela. The recent gossip in the Station of her misconduct had so wounded his self-love, that his affection for her, which was based upon this part of his nature, was in a languishing condition.

That evening Kathleen was in her sitting-room answering a note, when Harford was announced. She jumped up from her writing-table with a glad look of welcome. She had heard the rumor of Angela's visit to him, but she knew in her heart that he was absolutely free from blame. She had not a suspicion of offense against him. He, however, felt he could not rest until he had tested for himself her estimate of the occurrence.

"I have thought much about you the last few days. I mean in connection with the unpleasant gossip about," she said, going straight to the point uppermost in both their minds.

His grey eyes flashed, a hot color burned in his cheeks.

"I hope you acquitted me of any blame."

"How can you ask? Do you not realize how I trust you, and do I not know poor Angela's besetment?"

His eyes grew soft, and he smiled.

"Thanks, I felt sure you understood!"

"I sympathize with you; it is so unpleasant to be talked about, but no one believes you to be in the wrong."

"It is awfully good of you to say so, but 'throw mud and some will stick,' you know!"

"Ah, yes! Well, never mind, you are above caring for the opinion of such folk!"

"I hope I am; as long as you think no worse of me I am content!"

There was deference in his eyes, and he was conscious of a magnetic current of sympathy flowing between them.

She smiled radiantly upon him, but turned the conversation.

"Poor Angela, you have been a good friend to her, and she is heart-broken at the thought of the mischief she has worked. Do you know I have her here, and am to keep her and the child while Mr. Fortescue is in camp?"

"Ah! That is good."

"She is in a critical state of health; naturally of an extremely delicate organization, the results of heredity, no doubt, her late excesses and those six months of 'Virona' have made severe demands upon her heart."

"Virona! What is that?"

"One of those horrid patent medicines, which is a strong alcoholic beverage, masquerading under the name of 'tonic.' She refused wine and whisky, and Colonel Green advised this. Utterly deceived, the poor girl consented to take it. She soon learned to rely on it. Her taste for drink was satisfied, and I fear from what I found out in Mussoorie, that she was hardly ever quite sober while there."

"How terrible! The enemy is indeed subtle. What can be done to warn people?"

"We can only expose the imposter."

He smiled upon her, and then said, "I want to tell you something which will cheer you. The Padre Sahib has been having several talks with me about abstinence. He was deeply impressed by Mrs. Fortescue's appeal at his table!"

"Good! And is he in any way convinced?"

"Not yet, but he is going to make an effort to change the wine at the Holy Communion from alcoholic to non-alcoholic."

Here a servant brought in a letter for Dr. Scott.

"Excuse my answering this; I will be but a minute, Mr. Harford. Here is a newspaper."

She moved to her table, and he, taking the paper, stood reading it by her side.

Suddenly looking up to ask a question, she found his eyes fastened upon her with a look of admiration—nay more, of devotion! His grey eyes had grown deeply dark, and from them seemed to pour a radiance like a ray from the sun, warming, lighting, protecting! A sensation as of being enshrined in a home of love and blessing pervaded her. Her heart throbbed wildly, her hands trembled, from heart to heart passed the electric current of love. He sat down suddenly and she heard the newspaper tremble in his hand while she, pen uplifted, sat absorbed in a whirl of feeling. She resumed her writing, but mechanically, her heart still beating in a strangely unexpected manner. In a few moments, however, she was able to finish her letter and was calm again.

She sent for the bearer and despatched it; then turning to Harford, said, "I fear I have kept you waiting a long time."

He started as if from a reverie, and replied with a curiously happy smile: "Is it long? I have not found it so!"

She pulled herself together, and made a few commonplace remarks.

He was very silent and did not respond. Then suddenly, as if he had just made up his mind, he said, "Will you drive with me, Dr. Scott? I have a new motor car."

She hesitated. "I am so busy. You remember I told you that Mrs. Fortescue is in my care!"

"Yes, but a motor car is swift; could you not spare an hour, say tomorrow evening—any time?"

She debated the matter rapidly in her mind. Yes, she would not disappoint herself of this pleasure; why should she?

"I can go at five o'clock, but I must be back by seven."

"Certainly; we will go and see Assanullah's Tomb."

After he had gone, she walked quietly into her bedroom and, locking the door, sat down to examine her state of mind. "Why am I so strangely moved? It is absurd for my heart to beat like this—it is not the first time a man has looked at me! My emotion almost mastered me! I must look out in the future. It is ridiculous to think that a man who seems so oblivious to the attractions of woman should stir me thus!"

clerk in the state senate, brings her into close touch with the legislation and law enforcement. Mrs. De Watts formerly held the same position in Texas as our Oklahoma superintendent, Mrs. Elliott—assistant to the state labor commissioner. So the Texas W. C. T. U. is likely to rival even Missouri in its contribution to Women in Industry legislation.

FROM MINNESOTA comes a cheering word on law enforcement for Women in Industry. On motion of the W. C. T. U. representative, the women's legislative council plans to ask for two amendments to state laws. The first will seek one woman member of the state industrial commission. The second will amend the minimum wage law to make knowledge of the law the employer's responsibility when once the commission has published its ruling.

ILLINOIS W. C. T. U. women will choose a month between now and election in which to ask every candidate to the state legislature to support the eight hour bill for women workers. Other organizations will keep the subject before their candidates in each of the other months. The joint committee is issuing an eight-hour leaflet which they'll be glad to share with other states.

INDIANA rejoices! Our own Culla Vayhinger, former state president, director of Americanization, and loyal friend of Women in Industry, has the nomination for state senator, and must be elected! She had pledged herself to defeat the present senator, when he opposed prohibition and welfare legislation. The state W. C. T. U. officers declared the best way to defeat him was to run against him. So she did—on a Women in Industry platform.

Postmaster-General Work Says:

"It requires the use of about thirty-six muscles to smile and of ninety-seven to frown. Why work overtime?"

A delightfully modern mother was being motored round the park by a very young daughter. As they shot recklessly into the courtyard the accelerator was applied instead of the brake and the car dashed straight into the side of the house. The shock flung the occupants over the windscreen.

What would the mother of a century ago have said? The modern mother merely remarked, "Well, dear, as we have stopped, perhaps we had better go in and have lunch."—R. Forbes in Chicago Herald-Examiner.

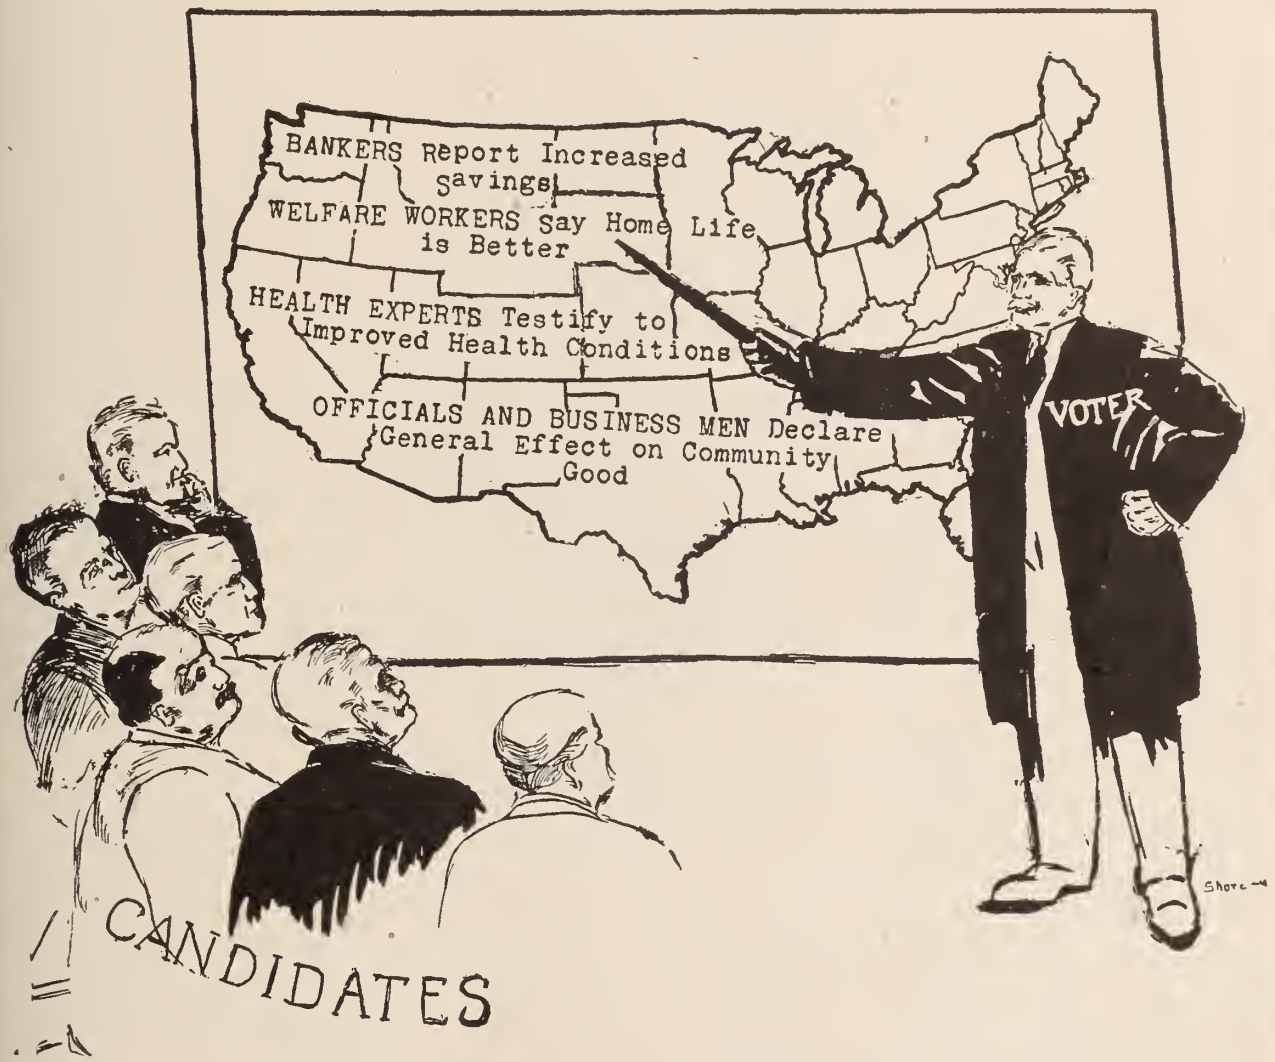
How Prohibition Stands the Test



Comprehensive Compilation of Conditions for Congressional Candidates to Consider

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

CONGRESS FAILS TO MAKE APPROPRIATION FOR HYGIENE BOARD — ANTI-LYNCHING BILL OUT OF SENATE COMMITTEE—BILL FOR SCRAPPING NAVY CONSIDERED BY SENATE COMMITTEE—BONUS FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYES PROVIDED—AMERICAN MINISTER TO EGYPT

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Congress Fails to Make Appropriation for Hygiene Board

The Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, the Federal agency for fighting vice and reducing social diseases in the Army and Navy, ends its existence today after four turbulent years.

Early in the fiscal year just ending, high authorities declared the activities of the board would be included in the new department of Public Welfare. On these assurances the board did not submit a budget of estimates for the new year commencing July 1, 1922.

In the spring, it became evident that the new department of Public Welfare would not materialize in time to take over the board's activities without interruption. The Army, the Navy and powerful civilian organizations, notably the national organizations of women, made an effort to secure the transfer of the board's activities to the Department of Justice.

Bills were introduced in the House and Senate and a hearing was held in the House to that end. The bills did not come up for passage, however, in the crowded final days of the fiscal year. As an expedient the board proposed to the Budget Bureau that six months' appropriation, one half that for the previous year, be made to the board to carry on its activities while Congress decided its action on the pending bills. After discovering that the new item, $225,000 allowed to the Public Health Service for venereal disease control, was not to be used for law enforcement, and being impressed by General Pershing and other military authorities with the need for the work, the Budget Bureau approved the eleventh hour budget of the board. It was sent to the White House for signature and transfer to Congress. But it did not reach Congress in time for inclusion in the General Deficiency Bill passed June 29.

Thus July 1 finds the board without appropriation. Its headquarters force and a nation-wide field force are disbanded today. Thus passes out of existence one of the unique organizations in the history of the government. To its credit is the repression or suppression of the activities of eighty-three vice districts. At the height of its activities the rate for social diseases was the lowest the Army had ever seen.

In the passing of this board, the United States government will lose the talented services of Dr. Valeria H. Parker, who was the executive secretary. Dr. Parker is the highest and best authority on social hygiene, and her sane administration of the work has been most highly commended.

House Votes To Aid U. S. Employes Sixty Years of Age

The House has passed legislation extending provisions of the retirement act of government employes sixty years old who have served the government fifteen years. Many of these were recently dismissed.

To assist those dismissed without notice after having served within a few months of their retirement period, Representative Louis W. Fairfield, of Indiana, introduced the bill which provides that "any employe who has become separated from the service through no delinquency on his part, and who after serving fifteen years has reached the age of sixty years, shall be granted an annuity certificate by the Commissioner of Pensions."

Upon passage it is provided that the bill shall become retroactive to include the Navy Yard employes who were dismissed as a result of the arms conference. The bill goes to the Senate.

Anti-Lynching Bill Out of Senate Committee

The Dyer anti-lynching bill, providing for imposition of penalties by the Federal government for mob action, was, by a vote of 8 to 6, reported favorably with amendments by the Senate Judiciary Committee. The vote ended a long committee fight over the bill, which was passed last January by the House. Opponents of the measure have declared it an unconstitutional interference with state rights.

Comparatively few changes were made in the original House bill and these were said to be designed to meet the constitutional objections.

The bill declared that if states fail, neglect or refuse to maintain protection of life they shall be deemed to have denied the constitutional guarantees, and the Federal authorities will have power to act by indictment of state officials or members of a mob and trial in the Federal courts. The measure requires "reasonable" efforts by state officers to maintain order and protect prisoners, and their failure would subject them to imprisonment for five years and a fine of $5,000.

Members of mobs in which a prisoner is put to death would be subject to conviction for conspiracy, with imprisonment for five years to life provided. Counties in which fatal mob disorders occur would be liable to the family of the victim under a forfeit of $10,000.

Amendments adopted by the Senate committee require that failure of the state officers to protect mob victims must be charged in the Federal indictment and proven to the satisfaction of the Federal trial court.

Army Bill Goes To President

Final agreement was reached on the Army Appropriation Bill, under which the average army for the coming fiscal year will be 125,000 enlisted men and 12,000 officers. Senate and House both accepted the conference report, and the measure has gone to the President.

In order to get the Army bill through before the end of the fiscal year, the Senate agreed to the House limitations on the $7,500,000 for continuing work on the Wilson Dam, Muscle Shoals, prohibiting expenditures of any portion of that sum prior to October first next.

Bill for Scrapping Navy Considered By Senate Committee

The Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate has begun consideration of the bill for scrapping the Navy to carry out the terms of the Disarmament Treaty under which the fighting strength will be reduced to eighteen battleships of the first line.

House Recesses Until August 15

Last night just before ten o'clock the House completed legislative action on a concurrent resolution providing for a summer recess until August 15. Cheers greeted the announcement that the resolution had carried, and the House sang lustily "Should Auld Acquaintance Be Forgot." Both houses recessed at six o'clock early evening until nine last night at which time the Deficiency and other bills were signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, in the presence of the two houses, respectively.

The Senate will remain on the job.

Zionist Movement Favored by House

The House this week passed a resolution favoring the Zionist movement in Palestine.

Bonus for Government Employes Provided

The $240 Bonus Bill for government employes was completed this week. This was hurried through when it was realized that the Sterling-Lehlback Reclassification Bill would not be passed before the beginning of the new fiscal year, July 4.

American Minister to Egypt

The President has nominated J. Martin Howell, of Ohio to be the first American Minister to Egypt. The appointment grows out of the change in the form of the Egyptian government, which after having been for many years a dependency of Turkey and afterward of Great Britain was on February 28 last formally recognized by the British government as an independent state subject only to certain limitations respecting the safeguarding of the Suez Canal and other special British interests.

Author of "The American's Creed" a Candidate for the Senate

William Tyler Page, clerk of the House of Representatives and continuously in the service of the House for more than forty years, and author of "The American's Creed," has announced that he is a candidate for the Senate from the state of Maryland. Mr. Page was appointed a page in the clerk's office of the House of Representatives in 1881, and has been continuously in the service of the House since that time.

THE DRAGON DRINK

Kathleen Norris

(Copyright, 1922, by the Republic Syndicate. Reproduced by special permission of the author and the Republic Syndicate.)

"——so that was the end of the old dragon forever and ever! And now it's your bed-time——"

The four-year-old delayed her beside his safe little crib only for a reassuring word.

"But there aren't really and truly any dragons, Mother?" he asked, when he had found his dingy old white rabbit and settled himself on his pillow. "It's just a story!"

"There aren't really and truly any dragons, dear. So kiss Mother, and good-night——"

And she turned off the light, and went softly to the door, and came blinking back to the sitting room.

"He doesn't really think there are dragons," explained little Eight, then, with indulgent superiority, "but he likes to talk about them!"

"I remember when I thought there were fairies and dragons," said Ten, deserting her struggles with the greatest common denominator, and wedging her slender little form between mother and brother, before the fire. "But I knew that if there were, Father and Mother wouldn't even let us go out of the house until they were all killed!"

She looked up in surprise as her mother's arm tightened about her—about them both. Why should Mother suddenly look so strange?

"But suppose I told you and Tom about a real dragon, Mary," her mother said. "A dragon that is walking about today, and killing more people than any fairy-tale dragon you ever heard about?"

The girl looked apprehensive, the boy hopeful.

"Here in America, Mother?" Mary asked, incredulously.

"Here in America, dear. And in almost every other country, too, stalking about and devouring men and women, and leaving little children in dirty rooms and dark alleys, to starve and suffer——"

"Mother, but not in America! Why, you said—you said that America was the most generous and the most tender-hearted country in all the world!"

"And so she is, Tom. You heard Dad say at dinner tonight that while Europeans are hiding their money in old socks, with children starving only a few miles away, we Americans are giving and giving and giving without stopping! It isn't boasting to remind you and Mary that yours is the biggest, and richest, and best country in the world."

"But, Mother—then what about the dragon? Do people know he's a dragon?"

"Oh, yes, they can read about him in books, if they want to. Or they can see for themselves that wherever he has been there is want and suffering and vice and disease."

"Mother!" Mary turned an earnest little face in the fire-light. "Is he War?"

"No, my darling, although you might call War a sort of dragon, too. But the saddest part about this story is that all the mothers and fathers in America have discovered a way to kill this dragon, only they don't want to kill him."

"They don't want to! The mothers and fathers!"

"Not all of them, no."

"But, mother, you said he ate people, and hurt children!"

"And so he does, my darlings. Why, Mary, there isn't a family in the Union that hasn't seen some loved one destroyed by him, and seen reason and intelligence and even sanity go down before him. But, you see, he's a very old dragon, and people have grown used to him."

"Used to something that hurts their children? Oh, Mother, they couldn't!"

"But they have, Mary. They say that there will always be dragons, and that there always have been dragons, and that it isn't right to kill them without everybody's consent. There are always some people like that, Mary. There were people who thought it was right to sell and buy slaves, you know, and to fight duels, and to honor bad kings, and to keep women from learning to read and write, just because they were women—there are always people who hate changes. They are afraid of change——"

"Mother," Tom said, bravely, "Americans aren't afraid. This dragon, whatever he is, isn't as bad as Valley Forge, I guess. I guess he isn't as hard to fight as Gettysburg, is he?"

Spanish War Veterans For Law Enforcement

The Henry W. Lawton Camp of Spanish War Veterans of Walla Walla, Washington, have by their recent action refuted the statement often made that the soldiers are for modification of the Volstead Law. Resolutions were passed in their June meeting, calling attention to the effort being made by certain elements of the population, "largely unnaturalized foreigners," to disregard and nullify the prohibition laws, and demanding that violators of these laws should be given adequate punishment, and that all loyal citizens should join in promoting law enforcement and observance.

Redlands Post of The American Legion For Wright Law

Instead of the favorite fiction that prohibition would never have been adopted had the American soldiers been at home, should be spread far and wide the favorable fact that many of their leaders as well as the "dough boys" themselves are among the strongest advocates of prohibition in the country. One of the proofs for this is found in the news that the American Legion post of Redlands, California, has by unanimous vote endorsed the Wright enforcement act.

As the Redlands Facts says: "Redlands post is to be congratulated by every organization and by every individual in the state who stands for law and order."

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle To Work For Prohibition In England

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, on the eve of his departure for England, according to press dispatches, declared himself a convert to prohibition. He also said he would work to bring prohibition to his homeland, although he would have to forego public speeches on the topic because of his psychic investigations.

"There is little drinking here today compared with what there used to be," he stated in regard to conditions in the United States. "Today, if you want liquor, you have to go and find it. Formerly it came looking for you."

Federation of Women's Clubs at Biennial Convention Favors Measures For Enforcing Eighteenth Amendment

By a unanimous vote of the large body of women in attendance upon the biennial convention of the National Federation of Women's Clubs, at Chautauqua, N. Y., a resolution was passed providing for assistance to be given in every way to measures enforcing legislation concerned with the Eighteenth Amendment.

United States Twice As Dry As A Year Ago

"One year of the Haynes brand of prohibition has made the country just twice as dry as it was in June, a year ago," says the Chicago Herald-Examiner.

"Convictions have doubled, withdrawals of liquor have been reduced by millions of gallons and whisky rings checked. This has been revealed in a summary by Commissioner Haynes. Commercial alcohol used was only 16,491,303 gallons, compared with 24,856,388 the year before. A saving of $155,900 was made in the wages of warehouse agents and $208,832 in rents and storage."

International Sunday School Association Passes Law Enforcement Resolutions

The following resolutions were enthusiastically and unanimously adopted by the International Sunday School Association, last week in convention assembled in Kansas City, Missouri:

"Inasmuch as the Eighteenth Amendment, adopted by a larger proportionate majority than any other part of our American Constitution, is in the interests of the nation's health, and is based on sound moral, social and economic reasons, we appeal to all good citizens to aid in the enforcement of all laws made to carry it into effect.

"We recommend to lesson writers and denominational publishers that the subjects of Bible temperance and training for Christian citizenship be included in all curricula prepared for, week-day religious educational work.

"We favor the continuance in the Uniform Lesson Series of the Quarterly Temperance Lessons, with suitable adaptations in all graded courses, and the maintenance of temperance teaching as one of the points in the international standard of Sunday school efficiency."

American Legion of Nebraska Stands For Enforcement of Liquor Laws

Strict enforcement of the prohibition laws is favored in a resolution passed by the executive committee of the American Legion, department of Nebraska, in its recent meeting, according to press dispatches. The resolution calls on all the posts of the legion and upon the individual members, as well, to assist in stamping out in every possible way the crime wave and disrespect for the laws prohibiting liquor.

PROMINENT WOMEN EXPRESS APPRECIATION OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

"The women of this country were the first to demand prohibition, and they will be the first to demand its repeal," Elizabeth Marbury, speaker for the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment is reported to have said. THE UNION SIGNAL takes pleasure in giving the testimony of representative women as to the sentiments of their sex on this vital question.

The Baby That Had a "Prohibition Outfit"

Maud Wood Park, President National League of Women Voters

The League of Women Voters has made no study of the effect of prohibition on home life and the welfare of children, and my work has given me no opportunity for special observation in that field. I can only repeat the story one of my friends tells me of a radiant-faced mother she saw not long ago in the two-bed pay ward of a great city hospital. In that same hospital, but in the crowded free ward, the mother had borne one other child. With touching pride she called my friend's attention to her new infant's dainty frock. "That dress is every stitch hand-made," she said. "I had a real outfit for this little one. I call it my 'prohibition outfit'—and this time Jim comes to see the baby and me every day."

It is not easy to imagine that mother working to bring back the saloon which left her no "real outfit" for her first baby. The mothers of the nation are no more likely to wipe out the Eighteenth Amendment than they are to demand the cultivation of typhoid germs in the water supplies science has purified.

It is not necessary to ask the attitude of the women of my acquaintance toward the enforcement of prohibitiou. The League of Women Voters is heartily in favor of the enforcement of laws from the time they are put upon the statute books.

In Eugland there is a general feeling that the United States adopted prohibition not out of sentiment nor because of altruistic motives, but out of a shrewd, cold-blooded, Yankee conviction that a prohibition country would outstrip drinking nations in health, wealth, efficiency and power. My personal opinion is that this is wholly true, and that the continuance of prohibition is assured because it lays a sound economic foundation on which permanent national well-being can be built.

The Workhouse Tells the Story

Mina C. Van Winkle, President International Association of Policewomen

It has been our pleasure to learn that since prohibition went into effect, to a large extent the jails and workhouses are being emptied. The last time I visited the workhouse in the District of Columbia, there was a population of less than 100 men and only eight colored women instead of the pre-prohibition number of some 1,500 men and 200 women. Under the dry regime families are better provided for and happier. There seems to be a more normal family life than when liquor was obtainable by men of weak character.

The attitude of the women with whom I come in contact is generally favorable to prohibition, but then my acquaintance is limited largely to persons engaged in social and protective work, all educated and law-abiding citizens. In my day's work I see the other kind of women and feel that with relation to the prohibition laws, anarchy is in practice in the American upper classes today. They who should be good examples not only persist in willfully and publicly breaking these laws, but they inspire lawlessuess in the so-called lower classes.

National prohibition is one of the greatest safeguards to youth and to the home. There have been more broken homes, more destruction of character through weakening of the will, and more crime induced by drink than from any other known cause. I trust that national prohibition has come to stay. Although we daily see the law broken, time will wear away the objection and abuse.

Amy Kaukonen, M. D.

Prohibition a Blessing

Amy Kaukonen, Mayor of Fairport, Ohio

It is my deep conviction that through all time women and children have suffered most from the demon that lies like a coiled serpent in the bottom of the whisky bottle, and every thinking woman knows that in every community the home life of the women and children has benefited immeasurably by that boon from on high—prohibition.

The women of my acquaintance have as great respect for the Eighteenth Amendment as they have for the Ten Commaudments. As to my personal opinion regarding the value of national prohibition as a promoter of the health, prosperity and happiness of the family, I sincerely believe it more valuable than anything else except a Christian education and a thorough training in American ideals.

A Law That Protects the Child

Grace Abbott, Chief of the Federal Children's Bureau

From my own experience and observation, and a study of the available reports with reference to the effects of prohibition, I see no reason for changing my attitude concerning the Eighteenth Amendment and the Enforcement Law. I regard national prohibition as necessary for the protection of the health and welfare of children.

No One With a Social Conscience Can Take a Stand Against Prohibition

Mary E. Woolley, President Mount Holyoke College

My experience and observation have been that prohibition has had a great influence on the betterment of home life and the welfare of women and children among the classes that frequented the open saloon. The increase of small deposits in savings banks and the decrease of candidates for county jails in many parts of the country I think are proof of this. I am troubled by the attitude of many men belonging to the more privileged classes, who are deliberately violating the law, but it seems to me that this is an indictment of them and not of the Amendment.

The general attitude of the women of my acquaintance toward the Eighteenth Amendment and the Enforcement Code is favorable. My acquaintance among college and professional women is wider than that in the society group, although I know many women in the latter class who feel as strongly as I do on the question.

There is no doubt in my mind that national prohibition is a promoter of the health, prosperity and happiness of the family and society generally. I cannot see how anyone with a social conscience, whatever his own personal preference, can take a stand against it.

My Acquaintances Will Oppose Any Weakening of Enforcement Law

Catharine Waugh McCulloch, Master in Chancery of Superior Court, Cook County, Illinois

Prohibition has improved home life and promoted the welfare of women and children. The women with whom I associate are Congregationalists, college women, teachers, W. C. T. U. women, League of Women Voters members, women lawyers and doctors, members of the Federated Women's Club, the Democratic Women's Club, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and the wives and mothers in my home city, and they are almost unanimously in favor of the Volstead Act and its strict enforcement, and will oppose its weakening by any "light wine and beer" adjunct.

The welfare of the home and the nation imperatively demands national prohibition.

HOW CAN WOMEN PROMOTE SENTIMENT FOR LAW OBSERVANCE?

LEADING WOMEN OF AMERICA, IN ANSWER TO REQUEST FROM THE UNION SIGNAL EXPRESS THEIR CONVICTIONS IN REGARD TO OBSERVANCE OF AND RESPECT FOR LAW

Reverence For Law a Matter Of Education

Mary Anderson, Director Woman's Bureau, U. S. Department of Labor

Prohibition has been of benefit to the country. I have observed that a better standard prevails among the families of the working people and that the children are better fed and clothed. That statement can be substantiated by figures showing that every place where prohibition is enforced, more goods are being sold than previous to the time of prohibition. Instead of having the corner saloon as a working men's club, we have transferred that club to the home.

There is some disregard of the Eighteenth Amendment by people who are otherwise law-abiding and who, perhaps, are the loudest in asking other people to observe the law of the land. That, to my mind, is a natural outcome of the enforcement of a law which disturbs the habits of centuries. Women can insist upon enforcement of this law and report negligence in enforcement. I think it is peculiarly fitting for women to do this. First, because they are naturally law-abiding and, second, because it means so much in the life of every woman and every child.

Every mother has a very sacred duty to perform in instilling in the minds of youth the proper reverence for this law, as well as all other laws. The educational authorities can do much along this line and if we all make up our minds that the Eighteenth Amendment is going to be at least as well enforced as every other amendment to the Constitution, we shall have gone far in securing proper reverence for the law. Much education has to be accomplished and it is in that direction, in my opinion, that we ought to bend our greatest effort.

Administration of Law an Important Factor in Prohibition

Florence Kelley

I am glad to record my conviction that prohibition already benefits the country, and that the benefit increases continuously, in spite of all difficulties of enforcement. When the law against murder—the oldest law known to mankind—is so lightly regarded in this country, it is obvious that a new law must require much time to find universal acceptance and obedience.

As to the effort of women, individually or in groups, to promote sentiment in favor of obedience to the law—I have become convinced that one means, too long deferred, is placing the courts themselves on the basis of justice.

One effective step is an immediate intensive campaign for the appointment and the election of women as judges. Is there any reason why women should not form one-half the total number of judges—city, county, state and federal? Not in the sense that judgeships are plums to be equitably distributed among office seekers, but because the community needs, in the administration of the law, whatever wisdom life bestows upon both sexes. Is it not clear that the discriminatory absence of women from the bench may well be one cause of widespread disregard of the law?

Women are interested in cases relating to marriage, divorce, guardianship, mortgages on family homes, inheritance, investments through which their families are enriched or impoverished. Insurance cases, too, concern us. In every decade increasing tens of thousands of women and girls are personally affected by decisions of judges as to laws which regulate industry. This is especially true since the war inventions adapted machines to our height and strength and America took over the poisonous German dyes and solvents, without the German safeguards.

We learn how directly the administration of the criminal law touches us, when confirmed criminals, previously convicted of crimes of violence against women, are allowed at large under trivial bail.

Women Who Have Done Judicial Work

The careers of Catharine Waugh McCulloch as justice of the peace in Illinois, of Florence Allen as county judge in Cleveland (Cuyahoga county), Ohio, and of Judge Katherine Sellers in the District of Columbia, of Associate Judge Bartelme of the Children's Court in Chicago, illustrate, in the limited area hitherto open to women, the service that we can render.

Suffragists used to predict that the laws would be more uniformly obeyed and better enforced when we acquired votes. But before that prophecy can be fulfilled, we must use our votes for re-electing those men only who are known by their official record to be wise, just, and modern. All others should be replaced as rapidly as opportunity offers, until half the judges are women.

It is only habit, usage, tradition, which has made people accept so long the administration of the law solely by one sex. From the importunate widow and the unjust judge in the New Testament, it has been assumed (with rare exceptions) that, just or unjust, judges must be men.

The struggle for suffrage and prohibition accustomed women to contact with Congress and the legislatures. But relatively few have had direct experience with courts. In general, we are unaware of the incessant influence upon the collective mind of judicial decisions, from the daily fines imposed on automobilists (or remitted!) by local police courts, to long dreaded annulments of social statutes by courts of last resort.

All Law Schools Should be Open to Women

Obviously there are, for the moment, not enough duly qualified women lawyers available to fill half the judgeships as rapidly as vacancies will occur. This is, however, a reason for nominating all the suitable candidates who can be induced to enter this field of duty. A systematic effort should be sustained as long as may be necessary.

It should be made clear to college and to high school girls that this hitherto neglected opportunity for the exercise of woman's highest qualities of mind and character will, henceforth, be increasingly accessible to them.

Whatever difficulties may have to be met, we shall not have used all our resources for promoting the law-abiding habit of mind, until justice, mercy and wisdom prevail in the makeup of the courts. Because the change will necessarily be a gradual one, no time should be lost before beginning.

The Women Never Will Demand Repeal of Dry Law

Lena Lake Forrest, President National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs

I have such great faith in the women of my own nation that I can not for one moment believe that they will ever demand a repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Every thinking woman knows that prohibition is for the good of our country and while it may be true that the rich have for their use all the liquor they may wish, it is their families that will have to pay the price in sorrow instead of the poor, unfortunate wife and children of the poor men, as in the past.

All social workers tell us that their tasks have been greatly reduced by prohibition. Of course the business world strongly favors it because of added efficiency and increased savings. It goes without saying that many homes in which there were tragedies in the past are today prosperous and happy, and the children are receiving an education and realizing the joy of a real home life.

To Create Sentiment For Prohibition Use Facts—Facts—Facts

Sallie W. Stewart, President Indiana Federation of Colored Women

The W. C. T. U. takes as its "holy task" the right leadership of children of the land by Christian women. It is, therefore, evident that no organization has a greater mission and the results of the work have been of benefit to the country, particularly in the change that has come to the great poor class who formerly were habitual drinkers (not all of them drunkards) before the passage of the great Eighteenth Amendment. This observation relates to inhabitants of a city of about one hundred thousand where there were great numbers of persons of meager education, many of them laborers. There were few if any recreation centers and the men found pleasure in frequenting the saloons and the women in partaking of liquor and making themselves generally ridiculous in their conduct and mode of living.

Directly after the prohibition law went into effect, there was a noticeable difference in the conduct and the general manner of these persons, and in the neighborhoods where there had been so many arrests for petty offenses, public nuisance, and also for criminal offenses the crime seemed to decrease and quiet reigned until the advent of the illegal sale or acquiring of liquor in such a way and in such quantities that it was possible for practically all who wished it to procure it.

During this period of quiet rest from the usual half drunken stupor, many "cleaned up" and bettered conditions in their homes. Many whose conduct and boisterous manners caused them to seem wholly degenerate have shown a better side.

It is deplored that in this same city there were candidates in the recent primary announcing themselves as "wets."

Chambers of Commerce of Large Cities Testify to Value of Prohibition in Civic Life

Answers to a questionnaire sent out by THE UNION SIGNAL to the Chambers of Commerce of many of the large cities of the United States, show a preponderance of sentiment in favor of prohibition, and testify that the dry law is a civic asset.

Rockford (Ill.) Chamber of Commerce Enthusiastic for Dry Law

You may place our organization on record as very enthusiastically and energetically favoring both local and national prohibition.

Rockford was given Camp Grant because it had had a record for many years previous of being a temperate town. Of course, immediately following local prohibition we had several buildings vacated, but only temporarily, as they were filled very soon afterwards by the normal expansion of business.

O. O. McLEISH, Acting Secretary.

Springfield (Mass.) Chamber of Commerce Gives an Affirmative Answer

I believe that prohibition has proved to be an economic asset to this community and that it has promoted thrift among our people. A statement from the various savings banks shows that more people have savings accounts and that the balances are larger.

The charitable organizations of the city tell me that taking into consideration the recent business depression, there are fewer people receiving aid than during the time before prohibition. The former saloons in most cases are being used for other lines of business.

Prohibition has been, I believe, very beneficial to the general interests of our city.

NELSON MARSHMAN,
Associate Secretary.

Concord (N. H.) Chamber of Commerce Terms Prohibition an Economic Asset

Prohibition has proven an economic asset to our community. It has promoted thrift among our people, and the savings banks depositors are constantly increasing.

Fewer people are receiving aid from charity organizations and there are fewer delinquents and dependents in our institutions.

Buildings formerly occupied by liquor concerns are all used for other lines of business.

It is my judgment that prohibition has been of the greatest benefit generally to the interests of our city.

E. W. PORTER, Secretary.

Springfield (Mo.) Chamber of Commerce Believes Prohibition Has Protected Its Youth

In answer to your question, "In your judgment has prohibition been beneficial generally to the interests of your city?" would say, prohibition has been helpful to the community for the reason that the oncoming generation has not had the access to liquor that was had by young men and boys of four or five years ago. In other words, there would seem to be less opportunity by far for the members of the next generation to become addicted to the liquor habit. On the other hand, judging from the police court records which show arrests for drunkenness, it would seem that those men who became addicted to the liquor habit still can find something to drink, if they can raise the price.

VANCE C. CRISS, Secretary.

Camden (N. J.) Chamber of Commerce Takes Poll of Representative Citizens

Rather than undertake to answer your questions myself, I am giving you the pooled opinions of the following representative men: Two bankers, a clergyman, an insurance man, Salvation Army leader, a Y. M. C. A. secretary, chief of police, a large manufacturer, the director of the Bureau of Charities, and my own.

(Total number answering, 11.)

1. Has prohibition proven an economic asset to your community?

Yes, 7; No, 2; Uncertain, 2.

2. Has it promoted thrift among your people, as indicated by an increase in savings banks deposits and depositors?

Yes, 6; No, 1; Uncertain, 4.

3. Are fewer people receiving aid from charity organizations as a result of prohibition? Are there fewer delinquents and dependents in your institutions?

Yes, 6; No, 2; Uncertain, 3.

4. Are the buildings formerly occupied by liquor concerns now used for other lines of business?

Yes, 10; No, 0; Uncertain, 1.

5. In your judgment has prohibition been beneficial generally to the interests of your city?

Yes, 9; No, 1; Uncertain, 1.

Uncertainty in regard to Questions 2 and 3 was due to the fact that unemployment and other factors enter into the matter in a way too confusing to permit of a satisfactory answer.

In regard to Questions 1 and 5, there was doubt as to whether prohibition could be judged accurately when it is so grossly violated as at present.

WILLIAM A. SEARLE,
Secretary-Manager.

Lowell (Mass.) Finds Benefit Immeasurable

The secretary of the Lowell (Mass.) Chamber of Commerce referred the questionnaire to the probation officer of the District Court for answer. That gentleman writes as follows:

"1. In a general way prohibition has proven an economic asset. While the elimination of the liquor business has likewise eliminated some sources of revenue, the deficit has been more than met in numerous ways, such as in the saving of money expended for the care and consideration of people who were thrown on the city and state for treatment and sustenance, as a result of drink.

"2. It has promoted thrift. From what I learn and read in the papers the savings banks deposits indicate, in a most pronounced way, thrift and industry and saving.

"3. Yes, despite the present conditions of non-employment and other recent developments that would naturally tend to increase the number of applicants for aid, fewer people are receiving assistance from charity. The institutions report a smaller number of children in these places at the present time.

"4. The buildings formerly occupied by liquor concerns are in a majority of cases now used for other business. There are about twenty-five so-called near beer saloons in the city out of a possible total of over one hundred.

"5. In answer to the question, 'In your judgment has prohibition been beneficial generally to the interests of your city?', I would say, 'Absolutely, Yes.'

The records of the local court may be accepted as a fair barometer of what prohibition has done for the community. The peak in the number of arrests for drunkenness for one year was reached just before prohibition went into effect, when it totaled about 4,500, and in the following two years it dropped down as low as 1,800. These are approximate figures. The accompanying good that must have come with such a change, was quite apparent for those who wanted to see it. Such a radical change couldn't help but show good results. Since that time, however, there has been a rather pronounced increase in the number of offenders for drunkenness, but not near the figures of the 'good old times of the happy past.'

"Why ask if prohibition has done any good to the community? It isn't a question of whether it has or not, but rather of how much good it has done. Surely it has done good, and will do good in the future immeasurably if those who can will enforce the laws as they may be rightly enforced.

"JOSEPH L. CRONIN,
"Probation Officer, District Court of Lowell, Mass."

Minneapolis Civic and Commerce Association Says Prohibition Has Proven Beneficial

We will say "Yes" to all of your questions with the exception of No. 3. More people are receiving aid from charity organizations at this time, but it cannot be said that this is the result of prohibition. There are more delinquents and dependents in our institutions.

JAMES S. CADY, Secretary.

Gloucester (Mass.) Chamber of Commerce Gives Positive Affirmative

Answering Questions 1, 2 and 3 with a definite "Yes," the manager of the Chamber of Commerce says that in his judgment prohibition has been decidedly beneficial to the interests of the city; that for causes due to intemperance there have been fewer people receiving aid from charitable organizations, and adds: "It is true that we have bootlegging, but even at the worst it is less harmful to the community than the previous state. All the buildings formerly occupied by liquor concerns are used for other and constructive purposes."

Sedalia (Mo.) Chamber of Commerce Reports Steady Growth in Sentiment for Prohibition

I can truthfully and consistently answer "YES" to all of your five questions. Specifically answering No. 4: When the saloons were legislated out of business, we had twenty-three, and quite a good many people were apprehensive that the buildings they occupied would stand idle and vacant, but the facts are that the city never was so cramped for business space as now and we have no vacant buildings, in fact, we have not had from the start. Of course there is a lot of bootlegging going on here as elsewhere, but it is being held down to the lowest possible notch, and there is a steady growth in sentiment favorable to strict enforcement.

M. V. CARROLL, Secretary.

The World's and National W. C. T. U. conventions are to be held next November in Philadelphia, the city of "sisterly love." These great events are only four months away. Begin to plan to attend or to send a representative from your local union. Thirty or more countries will be represented at the World's gathering, many by native workers. To meet and converse with them concerning their respective countries will be almost equal to taking a trip around the globe. Postpone your summer vacation until November, and attend these inspiring meetings.

The children have played an important part in the historic prohibition campaigns of the past. We need them to help us in the present movement to wake up the people and to get ready for the Congressional primaries and elections. Mobilize the children of your community on July 21, Loyal Temperance Legion Day, for active duty. How to do it and where to get program helps is told on page 12.

Facts vs. Fallacies

"Three years' experience gives some laboratory results of prohibition and it is about time for the nation to consider them," moralizes a newspaper strongly antagonistic to the dry law.

We heartily concur in this statement, and if the people can be brought to consider these results, seriously and without prejudice, there is not the slightest doubt as to their conclusions—they will unanimously favor prohibition.

For several months THE UNION SIGNAL has been publishing each week a page or more of first hand evidence from governors, mayors, bankers, health commissioners, social welfare workers, educators, manufacturers and labor experts as to the value of prohibition. This week we give similar testimony from chambers of commerce and noted women. These statements alone, if they can be brought to the attention of the people who are sceptical of the benefits resulting from the dry law, ought to convince them. We ask you whom this paper reaches to help clear the atmosphere of that falsehood, "Prohibition is a failure", by circulating among your acquaintances these well authenticated facts, proving indisputably that prohibition has been and is in a marked degree beneficial to the community life.

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES AND OTHER INFLUENTIAL ORGANIZATIONS

W. C. T. U. Speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

(Through your local papers give wide-spread publicity to the resolutions thus secured.)

One statement based on the actual experience of an American-owned and operated ship is worth a hundred conjectures of what calamity will befall if prohibition is enforced on our merchant marine. We have the statement. It is made by Glenn Byers, special writer for the Shipping News Section of the San Francisco Bulletin, who, in the issue of June 19, quotes William G. Sellender, general passenger agent of the Matson Navigation Company, whose fleet of ships on the Pacific ocean has been dry since prohibition, as saying: "We have never had a greater volume of business in our history than has been handled aboard our ships since prohibition became effective. Mr. Sellender was discussing the fact that the dry 'Matsonia,' a really dry boat of the fleet above mentioned, went out with every cabin filled and standees in the smoking room, while 'The Nile' which had been advertised as being 'wetter than the river Nile,' was about half filled for a similar voyage.

"So rarely do passengers engaging space on the Matson ships raise the question of liquor that I can believe that it does not enter their thought when they are booking," remarked Mr. Sellender, whose years of experience in the local passenger business have caused him to be alert for all indications that register what is pleasing to passengers. "On the other hand," he added, "we have heard passengers express satisfaction that the ships are dry, and among them have been drinking men who, on occasion, have gone to Honolulu on one of the 'wet' trans-Pacific boats and have returned on one of the Matson vessels."

It seems evident, judging from the experience of shipping men on the Pacific Ocean, that there is little cause for apprehension that the enforcement of prohibition on the high seas will mean that all trade will go to foreign ships.

Is Your Citizenship in Heaven?

The story is told of Dwight L. Moody that one day near election time he met an evangelist, and asked him, "What is the political outlook?"

"I do not know anything about the political outlook," was the reply; "My citizenship is in heaven."

"Better get it down to earth for the next sixty days," said Moody very emphatically. And the Record of Christian Work, in relating the incident, adds that Moody believed that a man who shirked his duties in this life was not a good candidate for the next world.

Most countries have laws against citizenship privileges in two countries. If a foreigner becomes a naturalized American he is supposed to renounce his citizenship in his native land. But here is one exception, for not only may we be citizens both of this world and of heaven, but is there any question that the more carefully we perform our duties on earth, the better citizens are we of the other land? The claims of this double citizenship will never clash.

It has been a misunderstanding of this great truth, no doubt, that has at so many times kept church members from performing their civic duties, but as the primaries and the elections come on, may it never again have to be said that because Christian people, church members, did not do their duty at the ballot box, good men lost either nomination or election. Our citizenship is on earth as well as in heaven, and it is our part to help to bring heaven to earth, and to make earth a heaven.

Enforcing the Law

In attempting to clear its skirts of the charge that it is opposed to the enforcement of the prohibition law, the Philadelphia Record states frankly that it disapproves of prohibition as at present embodied in law, but emphasizes its belief that the law ought to be enforced until changed.

"If The Record could have its way, every prohibition enforcement officer would do his duty; there would be no bribe-takers in charge of the administration of the laws; every violator of the laws, rich or poor, high or low, would be sent to jail for the maximum term prescribed by the statutes, and the whole country would be as dry as Sahara. Given that condition, we should have more respect for law in general, and should soon know where the populace really stands on prohibition."

We agree most heartily with the Record in the matter of enforcement of the prohibition law, but with this difference in our conclusions—that if prohibition has already accomplished so much good as is evidenced by the testimonies of leaders in all walks of life, we believe the absolute enforcement desired by the editor quoted above, would have such wonderful effect upon community and national life that the subject would be dropped once and forever.

Therefore, we, too, "most strongly advocate the most rigid enforcement of the Volstead Act."

FOR ALL THE MOTHERS OF THE WORLD

Cora Frances Stoddard

In the steamer mail that added joy to the traveller's day last summer when en route to Lausanne for the International Congress, was an envelope dated for the last day of the voyage. It bore the handwriting of a young mother of a cherished namesake. All it contained was this "jingle":

"And now you're at your journey's end.
Please throw a smashing ball
For all the mothers of the world
At old King Alcohol."

Kathleen Norris in a recent daily press syndicated article puts upon the lips of the mother this answer to her little daughter's question, "Who will kill the liquor traffic?"

"'American women will kill it, God willing,' she gravely said. 'The women who have suffered shame and hurt and want and wrong for too many years. The women who have loved some poor victim. The women who have Marys and Tommies to guard from danger.'"

The mother of two little sons said the other day that her mother had lately remarked that she was glad the daughter would not have one anxiety that had shadowed the years in which her own boys were growing up. "You won't have to be afraid that the saloon will get your boys," she had said.

Whether that young mother will have reason to fear the liquor traffic—if not the open saloon—depends very considerably on the women of America—and now. The next few weeks and months may be critical ones. At the primaries and at the autumn elections legislators are to be selected who have it in their power to hold or to weaken prohibition legislation. All through the summer the politicians will be speeding the political machine; the opponents of prohibition have their drag-nets out in hotel corridors and elsewhere for signatures against prohibition, and are circulating through the press misleading statements about prohibition and alcoholic liquors.

The men of the prohibition movement can be depended on to build as firmly as possible the platform of "obey and enforce the law of your country," first, because it is the part of a good citizen to do this; and, second, because the results of prohibition demonstrate its benefits to public welfare.

Women will do this, too. But the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, if it is to "throw a smashing ball," will apply itself with increased vigor to its familiar task of building into public knowledge the underlying reasons for prohibition, the facts about beer and wine, about the now demonstrated effects of alcohol which are directly contrary to the traditional ideas still held by many a man and woman voter.

When these facts are thoroughly understood we shall have fewer really thoughtful and conscientious citizens wondering if, after all, it would not be better to permit the sale of beer and wine, and by their uncertainty so much weakening a section of public opinion that ought to be intelligently and unequivocally for prohibition.

The facts about alcohol help to undermine the personal liberty argument when, as public health facts, they are put side by side with similar restrictions on articles or actions likely to endanger public health. Let us put into our private and public libraries this summer, for example, the new edition of "How to Live" by Dr. Irving Fisher and Dr. E. L Fisk, passed upon by some of the great physicians of the country, and let us call attention to it. Its chapter on alcohol has important facts for these days on this very point of alcohol as a menace to health. Perhaps your local editor will be glad to publish facts from the book. Ask your influential women to read the chapter on alcohol. There is much else in the volume that even may serve as an introduction. Try to reach the women who are gradually becoming the political leaders in your town and city. It will help check some careless expressions of opinion of opposition or indifference to prohibition. What about the leading club women? Are they intelligent as to the facts about alcohol that make its prohibition important to every home? Do they know what prohibition is doing to make women, boys and girls of our country happier and healthier? Shall we not make it a part of our summer's work to endeavor to reach leaders of women, the women whose opinion, word, example, and influence count with other women.

The hand that placed on my desk the clipping by Mrs. Norris, at the same time put down a clipping concerning the home manufacture of certain "wines." An educated, well-to-do woman said, not long ago, laughingly, that, of course, they never had had anything alcoholic in their home with several sons in the family, but that her maid had now come to her and said that she was making some wine "for the men"—and there was no intimation that the maid was checked in the proceeding.

Home-made fermented wines, home-made beer, yeast being used in the process, mean that women are not only not trying to drive out alcoholic liquors, but are inviting them into their homes and perpetuating the use of alcoholic beverages. Can we not wisely and tactfully put before women their responsibility in this matter, showing how it helps keep weak the fabric of national life that we are trying to strengthen by putting away alcohol? The summer is a good time to do constructive work in this direction. There is a leaflet suggesting recipes for healthful non-alcoholic drinks which will be helpful to some housekeepers as they almost automatically begin to fill their storerooms for the winter.

Women can work with women in these special ways that constitute a special obligation. The work must be wisely done. Choose your literature for your woman. Mere "scattering" of leaflets may be sheer waste without results. The W. C. T. U. Publishing House has a large variety of leaflets on many topics that have to do with alcohol. We used to talk about sowing a state "knee-deep" with literature. Better, plant well-chosen seed in every available mind.

Perhaps even more important is the individual mind of the worker well-stocked with facts so clearly understood in their various relations that they can be marshalled to meet any emergency. The word fitly spoken often has power and opportunity where the printed word would seem forced. We are not true to our high purpose if we are not willing to do some studying so that we may have the most essential facts always in mind for an emergency. The woman you meet at a summer convention or at your summer home you may never meet again. The intelligent, well-chosen word in your piazza conversation may change the whole trend of her thought on this matter. With the "Service Package" of leaflets you can perhaps start many women to passing on information and that without leaving your desk.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

A Prayer

Lord, let me live while I can see
The beauty in the blossoming tree,
The message in the wayside flower,
And love it for its one short hour;
While morning song of lark and jay,
Can scatter all my doubts away,
And lift my poor heart from the sod,
And tell them I am born of God;
While I can feel I'm linked with all
The burdened ones who halt and fall,
While I can feel my share of blame
In every cheek that's dyed with shame,
While I can feel life's burdens sweep
Across my heart and drive out sleep;
While I can suffer, hunger, strive,
Lord, let me live
—for I'm alive.

But if the time should come when I
Forget to lift my eyes on high,
Forget to seek for love divine,
Or seek it but for me and mine;
When my dim eyes shall fail to trace
Thy image in each human face,
When lulled by comfort, ease and pride,
I find my soul is satisfied
To build its house of wood and hay,
Letting the old world go its way;
Content to preen before a glass
Where wounded ones barefooted pass,
Easing my conscience if I must
By throwing hungry dogs a crust,
Then, Lord, thy crowning mercy shed
And let me die
—for I am dead.

—Nellie L. McClung
Alberta, Canada.

The spoken word, the carefully selected printed page, the poster in all possible public places telling "Why America Went Dry," the stereopticon slide and picture film telling the same story for "safeguarding the nation," the discriminating and helpful use of the press—all these are at hand to use this summer in laying the foundations for an intelligent and cheerful law observance which will go a long way toward simplifying law enforcement.

This is our job. It is "for all the mothers of the world." They look to us women in America to demonstrate that the dread of alcohol can be lifted from the hearts of the women of all nations.

How Can Women Promote Sentiment for Law Observance?

The prohibition amendment is of assistance to the feeble-minded and to those who are weak in the matter of self-control. The overcrowded condition of our institutions for the feeble-minded indicates that there are those not in the institutions who need protection and careful guidance.

I believe one of the best ways to create sentiment in favor of prohibition is to gather data, establish and publish the facts, advertise the results of prohibition and the effect of the illegal traffic in liquor and thus create public sentiment in favor of prohibition. Public sentiment against the liquor traffic will enforce the law.

According to court statistics from the city discussed, which were published in the paper, the following decreases in arrests occurred. For the years 1912 and 1920, respectively: Assault and battery, 505—164; assault and battery with intent, 28—1; drunkenness, 706—132; murder, 9—2; rape, 4—7; petit larceny, 284—168.

Decrease in the expense of the number of arrests alone for these periods is a benefit, to say nothing of the social betterment which must needs follow.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

ALL ABOARD FOR THE "LAW ENFORCEMENT SPECIAL"

Carolyn P. Lindsay, National Superintendent Exhibits and Fairs

When enthusiasm is needed, youth has it. When strength is required, youth gives it. Where numbers are desired, "bunches" and groups among youth swell the count. When there is a splendid job to be done, youth is ready to tackle it. And so the Young People's Branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union can and will employ God-given time in faithful service this summer.

Somebody asks, "But what can we do?" Well, I can think of nothing much more fun than a six-passenger car, six well-matched young people of ability plus the above named characteristics, a well planned four-day or seven-day trip, plenty of literature, posters, gasoline and fine weather combined.

Object? Why to make a barn storming, one-night-stand tour of your county in the interest of law enforcement. Let folks know you are coming. Ask them to plan a lawn fete, or some other nice thing for the afternoon, where refreshments may be sold. Urge them to plan a community gathering, opening with a "sing" for the evening, and, of course, insure lodging for the wayfarers and the welfarers. Each one of the party should have a specific job—chauffeur, secretary of literature, speakers (two) and musicians (two). A bondoptioon, or some sort of projector, would be an invaluable asset. Some will show postcards and other objects, as well as slides. A bannerette on the car might say, "Blank County W. C. T. U. Law Enforcement Special." The secretary of literature might act as commissary, as there will be some wayside lunches, and the fun in these everybody knows. Better carry your own sheet and equipment for showing pictures.

Every community has young people, so make your appeal to them, through the Y. P. S. C. E.'s, Epworth Leagues, B. Y. P. Unions, Chautauquas, old home weeks, granges, harvest home gatherings, etc. You must be resourceful and self-sufficient as a group, not depending upon individuals of the locality for leadership. "The Law Enforcement Special" must carry an attractive, versatile, snappy bunch, and every meeting should have at least one musical sextette number. Collections ought to be made and new members gained. Go to it and see "That ye fall not by the way."

How About That Poster Hike?

The poster hike is much less pretentious and not so broad in scope. The requirements are a day's time, posters, posters and more posters (the W. C. T. U. Publishing House has them—consult the catalogue for names and prices), hammers, small nails, a quantity of the tin, or pasteboard, or leather protectors so necessary, a bucket of paste of the kind that comes in powder form and is readily mixed, plenty of eats and drinks, and a jolly party! A short step-ladder is most useful on a poster hike. There are reasons! An automobile to take the party to the farthest point first, or else one to bring the hikers home is desirable. Country stores sometimes need persuasion to accept posters, and these do not always stay put, even when permission is granted, but use your best arguments and keep smiling just the same.

The out-door pageant, such as is familiar to all college students, is a most artistic production when properly staged. A Law Enforcement pageant, a World Prohibition pageant, an Americanization pageant, or a Child Welfare pageant could be beautifully illustrated. The "story" might be depicted by tableaus or animated posters. Portable calcium lights and locomotive headlights make fine "spotlights." A pageant can be truly made a "Mid-Summer-Night Dream" of loveliness.

Remember, dear young people, that our opponents never take a vacation, and that these are our b-u-s-y days.

Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale University Predicts Converts To Prohibition Will Increase Rapidly

In an open letter published in the Chicago Tribune of June 2, Professor Irving Fisher of Yale University says

"Personally I have been in favor of prohibition for several years and more so now than ever before. While it is undoubtedly difficult to enforce at present in large cities, where there is still a strong hangover sentiment against it, I believe that President Harding hit the nail on the head when he said that 'in another generation I believe that liquor will have disappeared not merely from our politics but from our memories.'

"I base this opinion on three sets of facts.

"First, so far as I can discover prohibition has succeeded far more than it has failed and is increasingly accepted. Disease, vice, crime, inefficiency, poverty, thriftlessness have decreased, according to statistics, and the efforts to excite the public against the law have been surprisingly small and futile.

"Second, the history of opinion in regard to state prohibition. Rather uniformly the history has been after prohibition has been established a conversion to it by those formerly against it.

"Third, a study of the alcohol problem convinces me that prohibition is the right and proper way of dealing with it. Some years ago I estimated that prohibition would add to the income of the people of the United States something like $5,000,000,000 and the recent experience with savings bank deposits and other indices lead me to think that this was under the mark.

"My prediction is that prohibition will bring converts to it and very rapidly."

The Secret of Success: "It's Team Work That Does It!"

The Young People's Branch is a team work organization. It can never accomplish its great work unless all its members "pull together."

"Vroeg," whose real name is Tom Vroegindewey, best guard in the intercollegiate basketball tournament at Indianapolis, a Kalamazoo College student, tells what the "team spirit" will do, as reported in The Baptist. In a most confidential way at an older boys' conference in the Y. M. C. A., "Vroeg" let the boys into what he considers the secret of their "winning streak." "Vroeg" says. "In order to play with a winning streak it is necessary for every fellow to forget himself and play with team spirit." "Vroeg" is considered the star of the team, but he emphatically denies the assertion, saying: "There are no stars, for we are all stars. It is team work that does it." He emphasized the fact that the brief prayer before every game put the fellows in the right spirit to co-operate successfully. "Vroeg" says: "The reason why so many fellows don't make a very big dent in this old world of ours is that they stop trying for baskets." He suggests that in order to make life's goals we have to keep trying and trying for the baskets, forgetting about the discomforts of the game, not becoming discouraged for a minute, realizing that others are depending upon us and that we are winning for them, not alone for ourselves.

Unity of Purpose and a will to help each other in accomplishing that purpose make perfect team work.

"It ain't the guns nor armament,
Nor funds that they can pay
But close co-operation
That makes them win the day.
It ain't the individual,
Or the army as a whole,
But the everlasting team-work
Of every blooming soul."

THE BUGLE CALL IS SOUNDING

YOUNG PROHIBITION GUARDS RESPONDING

Mary B. Ervin, National L. T. L. General Secretary

Hurry! Hurry!! Hurry!!!
Boost! Boost!! Boost!!!
Plan! Plan!! Plan!!!

The RUSH and the NOISE and the FUN are all about our BIGGEST L. T. L event of the whole year—the birth anniversary of Miss Anna A. Gordon, the far famed friend of boys and girls, President of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and Acting President o the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

This big birthday party comes on July 21 and we want the boys and girls in ev ery town in the United States to imagine that Miss Gordon is their personal guest for the day, and that they are honoring her with their songs and rally-cries games and picnic lunch.

Oh, what a jolly time the children will have and no one loves fun and a good time more than does Miss Gordon herself!

Of course, she can not be at all the "parties", but she will be thinking about the boys and girls everywhere and nothing will please her more than to know that you are helping on her birthday to "work for law enforcement where you are".

It is an open secret that Miss Gordon wants the celebration this year to be the biggest ever! She knows that the boys and girls have helped to drive the saloons from America and she believes that one of the very best ways to keep them out is to enlist the children in large numbers in every community as members of our L. T. L. National Prohibition Guards. She appreciates the influence and enthusiasm of youth and regards the boys and girls as potent factors for law observance and law enforcement.

So intensely interested is she in this movement that she has sent out this clarion call to every state in the union:

"I sincerely hope you will call upon your local unions to co-operate with Loyal Temperance Legion and National Prohibition Guards leaders in arranging that on or near July 21, there shall be a stirring rally of the young folk, either for a mass meeting, a picnic or a lawn party. Where there is no Loyal Temperance Legion, please beg the friends of law observance to organize one. Our young folks can easily be impressed with the big issue of this campaign year, and their activities enlisted as sentiment makers for the observance of law. They will heartily respond to the call to help hold the Volstead Code for the enforcement of prohibition.

A Youthful Prohibition Guard

"Please send out your bugle call for a great gathering of the youthful clans and array them against the associations seeking to nullify our prohibitory law.

"Yours for victory,
"Anna A. Gordon."

The L. T. L. Song for 1922

Tune: "Old Folks at Home."
Ida Lillian Page

Way down into the hearts of children If you will look,
You'll find a love of all that's righteous, No evil will they brook.

That's why we work for law enforcement O'er all our land;
That's why the children from all nations Should join and help our band.

Chorus

All the world needs prohibition— That is now our cry.
Come, children, help us in this struggle, Alcohol then will die!

An Institute Full of Interest

Special Correspondence

Blair county (Pa.) institute, held with the Tyrone union, teemed with interest. Mrs. Sarah Bain, county Evangelistic superintendent, conducted the devotional exercises.

Mrs. Ruth Wynn Porter gave an excellent talk on humane education, illustrated by "Grandma" and children, the latter telling of kindness to their pets and "Grandma" giving a few verses of scripture to prove them right. Mrs. Chorpenning, Y. P. B. speaker, enthused her audience with stories of young people's work. She urged the unions to send some young woman to the state convention to gain inspiration.

Mrs. Balsbach conducted the "trysting time," with scripture reading, a song, "Noontide," by Mrs. Bain, Jr., and prayer. In the absence of Mrs. Karns, musical director, Mrs. Harris, Mrs. Bain and Mrs. Waring led the beautiful song service.

Roll-call showed that every union in the county was represented, thus putting Blair county on the honor roll. The parliamentary drill by Tyrone ladies was a taking feature. Dr. Dietz, who was introduced by Mrs. Ida Patton Smith and comes from Ohio, where they are having a hard fight for law enforcement, told practical ways to secure evidence to send to enforcement officers. Women can put in office by their votes honest, conscientious officials.

Interesting current events were given by Miss Guinn of Altoona. Mrs. Sylvia Bennis gave interesting information relative to our soldier and sailor boys in hospitals. She showed bags and afghans that could be made and sent to these disabled boys. One was a sunshine bag, with seven pockets for raisins, sweetmeats, and useful articles, one pocket a day to be opened by the sick soldier, thus making a happy surprise for him for seven days—a true sunshine bag. Tyrone union has an afghan ready and Mrs. Groffus, county superintendent of the department of Soldiers and Sailors, is urging Blair county to earnest effort along this line, that the many sick and disabled boys may see that they are not forgotten.

It was a fine institute and very well attended and our county president, Mrs. C. C. Marks, may well feel encouraged with the results.

L. T. L. Demonstration in North Dakota Receives Hearty Applause

On a recent Saturday afternoon, members of the L. T. L.'s of three public schools of Fargo—the Lincoln, Roosevelt and Washington—over which the Fargo Scandinavian W. C. T. U. has supervision, celebrated in splendid fashion.

Led by their superintendent, Mrs. J. W. Jones, the children marched two by two, down Broadway, under police protection, carrying their banners and flags, giving their anti-cigaret yells, and ever and anon singing, "Prohibition's here to stay—in the U. S. A."

The demonstration attracted the attention of passers-by, who applauded heartily. Proceeding to Island Park, the children were served with dainty refreshments, the ice cream and lemonade being furnished by the Fargo Scandinavian union.

Reports of the year's work were given by the officers of each Legion, followed by short addresses by Mrs. Julia D. Nelson, president of the local W. C. T. U., and Miss Hanson of the Lincoln School. The children then played games, had a picture taken, and altogether spent a happy afternoon.

Mrs. Jones has held two silver medal contests recently and is doing a fine work among the children, who are very enthusiastic and always ready to respond to her appeal.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepdaughter come for a visit, and she learns that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb, wounded, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them. The doctor finds Angela ill and depressed, and at her request asks Fortescue to help his wife to resist her craving for liquor. Instead, he dismisses the doctor, and sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle, where she is easily led to take, first an alcoholized "medicine," and then the liquors offered by friends. Returning to Seraneb, she continues to drink, and wanders to Harford's bungalow one evening, after being turned out of the club, thus becoming a subject for gossip which her husband hears. He upbraids her, and she pours out her soul to Dr. Scott, who takes her to her hospital for treatment. Meanwhile, the friendship between Harford and Kathleen grows stronger. She accepts an invitation for a motor-car ride with him.)

CHAPTER XXIII.

Kathleen and Harford dashed out of the station on their motor-car ride, down an avenue of young tamarind trees, and beyond into a broad highroad, passing the clustering roofs of a mud hamlet, and the sheds and telegraph posts of the railway station, out into the flat country, green with fodder and the ripening winter crops. They had hardly spoken to each other beyond Harford's few questions as to his companion's comfort. The changing greens of an avenue of trees, pierced by broken shafts of sunlight, caught Kathleen's fancy.

"Let us go slowly and enjoy this," she said.

Harford lessened the speed. "You do not care for such swift traveling?"

"Yes, I like it, it is so exhilarating, and gives one the impression of power and space, but these flickering tints of green are too beautiful to lose in the dust of our flying machine."

"You are an artist!"

"No, but if I had not been a medical missionary, I would have gone in for an artist's life."

"You would have been successful! But tell me, are you quite happy in your medical life? It seems to me to have so much sorrow and gloom in it—disease and death, and frustrated efforts!"

"I rejoice I have a life to give to God's service. I am young, strong, free—"

"You rejoice in being free?" he asked. She hesitated a moment. "Yes—free to serve."

"I mean free as to earthly ties."

"No woman rejoices in loneliness."

"Are you lonely?"

"Well, I am away from my relations, and at times I long for educated companionship, but I have always fellowship with God, you know. He fills the heart of the solitary missionary!"

His eyes grew soft as he watched her face.

"You are very good!" he said, simply—then was silent. All that was highest and best in him was set vibrating by her words. He recognized her as his ideal woman. He saw in her pure eyes the end of his quest, the search for one worthy of all love and worship, upon which he had been unconsciously engaged.

They reached their destination in forty minutes and devoted ten to the examination of the fine Mohammedan tomb. India has many such. Its site was a plot of garden ground, where the dark spires of cypress and feathery branches of the neem tree encompassed it. They admired the hovering dome and delicate cupolas, the chased and fretted walls and windows of lace-like geometric designs in marble, and tried to read the verses of the Koran traced down the lintels of the doorways.

"It is still quite early, we shall reach home in thirty-five minutes; let us sit here awhile," he said, as they passed out into the garden.

Kathleen assented, and they found a seat from which they looked towards Seraneb. Its distant domes and cupolas stood out, dark purple against a yellow glow. It was near sunset: darkness was coming on apace.

Harford was silent, and his reserve affected Kathleen. She was conscious of his love for her, their spirits met and understood. He paid her no compliments, made her no flattering speeches, yet his eyes turned upon her with passionate love.

Kathleen was not a young girl, but a woman in sensibility and sympathy. She divined that he wished to speak, and that something withheld his words. Was he afraid of her? Why did he hesitate? Had he any reason on his part to prevent his speaking out?

She turned to him with a sympathetic gesture. "Mr. Harford, you are very silent!"

He sprang up and faced her. "Kathleen, I love you—love you with all the strength of my being!"

The Dragon Drink

"He's Drink, Tommy. That's what Mother means."

Dad had put down his book, and was listening. Now he came over to the davenport, with a serious face, and sat down close to Mother, with Mary in his lap.

"Tell us more about this dragon," he said.

"Well, he is just like the dragon in Baby's fairy story tonight," resumed Mother. "That dragon was bad enough when they let him alone, but, oh, Tom, wasn't he awful when the mothers and fathers tried to kill him? Tell Dad, Mary."

"'He writhed and roared and bellowed out flames,'" Mary recounted with relish, "'and he lashed out with his seven tails, and tore round in circles biting and snapping, and he poisoned the air for two leagues about!'"

"And is this dragon doing that, Mother?" Tommy asked, with interest.

"Yes, that's just what he is doing. He's making some people drink more than they ever did before, just because they are angry; he is making them talk crossly; he is making them find all sorts of silly excuses for what they do—making them say that their own Government has no right to make laws any more, and that our representatives are all bribed, every one, in Washington and in the forty-six states that want to kill the dragon! And some of them are saying that liquor is food, Tom, as if big men need a food women don't need. And the dragon is making them write books saying that all our good, kind family doctors are trying to kill the dragon so that only the doctors will have the right to sell liquor——"

"Doctor Adams!" shouted Tom, who had recently had a broken arm, and had faith in his surgeon.

"Well, and others like him, dear."

"But, Mother, that's not true!"

"No, but that's not all. People are laughing at the law, Tom, and they are thinking it is great fun to break it. Good men and women—or at least they think they are good, and the world admires and respects them—are hiding bottles, and telling untruths, and smuggling, and cheating, and think it's a great joke.

"It's just as if you had betrayed Washington in 1776, Tom, because there never had been, and you didn't think there ever could be, a democracy, or it's just as if Grandfather Cutler had secretly kept on selling and owning his slaves in 1865, because men had always been slaves and he didn't think the Government had any right to confiscate his private property!"

"But, Mother, are they crazy?" Mary asked, anxiously. "Don't they see all the harm they are doing?"

"They don't seem to, Mary. And yet this matter is much more serious than the one assassination that caused the big war, and cost all those hundreds of thousands of lives a few years ago."

"But, Mother," the little girl asked fearfully, "what will kill your dragon?"

Her mother smiled, and a quiet, confident look came into her eyes.

"American women will kill that dragon, God willing," she said gravely. "A greater force than any army ever was, anywhere. The women who have suffered shame and hurt and want and wrong for so many years. The women who have loved some poor victim of the dragon. And the women who have Marys and Tommies to guard from danger."

Her voice was very low now; she wasn't talking to the children, and there were tears in her eyes. Mary and Tommy were awed. They did not speak.

But Dad spoke, rather low, too, and suddenly put his hand over Mother's hand.

"You're right, Mollie," he said. "I give in. It's up to American fathers and mothers to kill the dragon!"

Noted International Lawyer Says Liquor Law Violators Menace Constitution

In a recent address before graduates of Syracuse University, Syracuse, N. Y., Mr. Louis Marshall, noted international lawyer, denounced the violators of the Eighteenth Amendment in private and social life, not from the standpoint of a reformer or prohibitionist, but on the ground that an attitude of contempt endangered the sacredness of the Constitution.

According to the New York Sun, Mr. Marshall asserted that "the habit had sprung up in colleges throughout the country within the last few years of deriding in radical fashion the rigid limitations of our government, and pointed out at length the misconception of the majority regarding the document on which the safety of our nation depends."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

SENATOR STERLING PROPOSES EIGHTEEN MILE DRY ZONE AT SEA — SENATE FAILS TO SECURE TWO-THIRDS VOTE FOR CLOTURE — WORKING WOMEN WIN FIGHT AGAINST WAGE REDUCTION — PRESENT STATUS OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY WELFARE ACT

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Senator Sterling Proposes Eighteen Mile Dry Zone at Sea

An amendment to the Tariff Bill which would extend the three mile zone to eighteen miles, as it relates to prohibition, was offered yesterday by Senator Thomas Sterling of South Dakota. The amendment is designed to aid the Federal Government in preventing the smuggling of liquor into this country, also to prevent ships from anchoring outside the three-mile limit, and there disposing of "wet" cargoes. The amendment reads as follows:

"Officers of the Customs, the Coast Guard, the Treasury Department or other officers whose duty it is to enforce the National Prohibition Act, may go on board any vessel, at any place in the United States, or within six leagues of the coast of the United States, and hail, stop and board such vessel in the enforcement of the laws prohibiting, regulating, taxing or relating to the liquor traffic.

"The provisions of the National Prohibition Act and other laws relating to intoxicating liquor shall be in full force and effect within six marine leagues of the coast of the United States and shall be enforced by such officers who shall have all of the authority conferred by this Section and by Section 3067 of the Revised Statutes, (Act of March 2, 1799, Ch. 22, 1 Stat. L. 668) upon customs officers in the enforcement of the customs laws."

This amendment extends the enforcement provisions of Section 581 of the pending Tariff Bill to prohibition enforcement. The limit prescribed in the pending bill is twelve miles or four leagues, and in this amendment it is eighteen miles or six leagues.

For the purpose of enforcing our liquor tax and revenue laws the jurisdiction of Federal officers is now established by law. In 1799 Congress enacted what are known as the "Hovering Statutes," by which certain control in customs matters was extended to four leagues from the shore in order to prevent fraud upon the revenue. Great Britain and other nations have similar statutes.

The construction of the law (Supreme Court Decision of May 15, 1922) forbidding the transportation or possession of liquor within the jurisdiction of the United States, opens the way for making prohibition enforcement more effective by extending the jurisdictional limit far enough into the sea to prevent these rum smuggling vessels from carrying on their nefarious trade in close proximity to our coast. It only purposes to protect this country from liquor dealers on the high seas who are trying to break down prohibition enforcement by hovering along our shores and carrying on a traffic which has been outlawed here.

Necessity for Such Legislation

Rum-smuggling ships of foreign registry are hovering along the coast of the United States supplying liquor for illegal purposes. We can not successfully cope with this illicit traffic under the present three mile limit law. Plans are under way and a company is promoting the anchoring of recreation vessels just outside the three mile limit to furnish liquor and debauching entertainment, as the advertisement reveals. Liquor smuggling ships are the most elusive and dangerous law breakers to apprehend. They comprise one of the greatest sources of liquor supply for illegal purposes. If we can extend our jurisdiction into the sea twelve miles to help enforce the customs and tax laws which were in effect before national prohibition and seize such ships, we can avail ourselves of this same principle to enforce constitutional prohibition.

Other nations have found it necessary to extend the three mile limit to ten and twelve miles in order to prevent the smuggling of liquor in violation of the revenue laws. Norway in September, 1921, enacted a law extending the jurisdictional limit to ten miles to prevent the smuggling of liquor into Norway. The vote in the Odelsthing on September 21, 1921, was 54 to 35. The bill passed the Lagthing on September 30 by a vote of 17 to 14.

Send a telegraphic appeal at once to your Senators for adoption of the Sterling amendment.

Senate Fails to Secure Two-Thirds Vote for Cloture

The attempt to enforce the existing rule for cloture was defeated in the Senate. It required a two-thirds majority, and the vote was 45 to 35. The defeat of the motion for cloture was not unexpected. Debate on tariff and other measures in this session will continue under the usual conditions. One Senator can prevent the passage of the most important measure by conducting a filibuster. It does not look hopeful for the limitation of debate in the United States Senate, at least not until women are members of that body.

Working Women Win Fight Against Reduction of Their Wages

Four women, chosen to represent 7,000 other women employed in the stores of the District of Columbia, last week defeated the proposal of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association to reduce the wages of women in the mercantile industry of the District.

The issue came before the Minimum Wage Board of the District on petition of the organized employers for a reduction from the minimum wage rate fixed by the Board in July, 1919, at $16.50 a week. The Board called a conference of employers and employes in the industry, with three members representing the general public, and the conclusion, at the fourth session of the conference, which was held last week, was 7 to 4 in favor of the employes. The three representatives of the public voted unanimously to sustain the employes' contention that the cost of living had not diminished since 1919 sufficiently to justify the reduction.

The minimum wage rate for women in the District of Columbia, by action of this conference, remains the highest legal rate in the United States. Kansas, over the protest of the employes, has recently fixed a $12 rate, Massachusetts has reduced one rate to $13.50, and California has reduced her minimum for manufacturing and canning industries from $16 to $15 a week.

The law provides that the minimum wage shall be adequate to meet the cost of living for a self-supporting woman. The employes successfully contended that whatever decline had occurred in the cost of clothing since July, 1919, when the present $16.50 rate was fixed, had been offset by increased cost of room and board, carfare, doctors' and dentists' services, and other essentials. They rested their case chiefly upon the testimony of cost-of-living investigations made for the Minimum Wage Board by the Women's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor, through Mrs. Spencer Gordon, investigator, and on minimum health standards as described by Dr. Rachelle Yarros, special consultant for the U. S. Public Health Service.

Present Status of the Maternity and Infancy Welfare Act

Provisional acceptances of the Act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy have been received from the governors of thirty-two states pending the next regular session of their legislatures.

Anticipating the enactment of the Maternity and Infancy Bill, six legislatures accepted its provisions prior to its final passage. One of these acceptances was good only in case the pending Federal Act was passed without change and another was technically inadequate. Of the eleven state legislatures having regular sessions in 1922, six have accepted the Act, two legislatures are still in session and three, New York, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island did not accept the benefits. Hence to date a total of ten states have accepted through legislative action. Although the New York legislature rejected the Federal measure, it created as a result of the women's campaign for acceptance a Division of Maternity and Infancy in its State Board of Health, and increased its previous child hygiene appropriation of $30,000 to $160,000, so that the mothers and babies of New York have profited by the Sheppard-Towner Act.

The funds authorized by the Act did not become available until late in March. The Federal Board of Maternity and Infancy has approved the plans submitted by thirty-nine states.

Thirty-one states have already received their allotments of Federal funds and are at work.

The contemplated activities vary in each state according to local conditions and are largely dependent upon previous local developments in the field of child hygiene. Included in the plans are such general fundamental projects as accurate birth registration, supervision, registration, and training of midwives, improved milk supplies, surveys of the medical and nursing facilities for maternal and infant care.

In states having well organized child hygiene divisions, where the necessary pioneer stages have been passed, an increase in the numbers of county or community public health nurses whose duties are to be extended to include surveys of facilities for maternity care and prenatal instruction to mothers in classes or in the home is contemplated. State and district supervisory prenatal nurses are in several states, an innovation which will insure high educational standards and approved nursing technique.

National Catholic Educational Association Adopts Resolutions Urging Instruction in Citizenship

Resolutions unanimously adopted at the nineteenth annual convention of the National Catholic Educational Association, held recently in Philadelphia, included, according to the North American, the following paragraphs:

"Pupils should be taught to appreciate the incomparable blessing they enjoy as citizens of our republic, and should be urged to prepare themselves to exercise in a worthy manner all the duties of American citizenship.

"Colleges and universities owe it to the nation to do all in their power to imbue our Catholic youth with a wholesome respect for law and all rightful authority."

Canadian Presbyterians Favor Straight Prohibition

During its recent meeting, held this year in Winnipeg, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, according to press dispatches, passed strong resolutions on the subject of prohibition, calling upon the church people of Canada to fight against anything less than total prohibition, and protesting against government control of the liquor traffic as a failure, since a government in the liquor business was practically obliged to bring in all kinds of liquor and to push their sale.

California Druggists to Aid Dry Fight

At the sixteenth annual convention of the California Pharmaceutical Association held recently in Avalon, resolutions designed to aid the government in the enforcement of prohibition were adopted. These, according to the Visalia (Cal.) Delta, include a plea that steps be taken to stop the opening up of the so-called "Talcum Powder" drug stores which have been springing up in the larger cities, stocked with a few drug articles, but in reality depending upon the liquor traffic for their chief revenue. To remedy this situation, the following resolution was passed:

"That it be suggested to the state prohibition director and prohibition commissioner at Washington that new drug stores being opened henceforth and apparently surviving only through illegitimate liquor traffic, be limited to five gallons of alcohol per month, the quantity not to be increased until the owner of such store can show a volume of legitimate business which will warrant such increase."

Another resolution hitting at these institutions reads:

"That no new drug stores being opened after date be given a permit to dispense spirituous liquors, whisky, gin, brandy or wine during the first twelve months of their business."

A resolution urging the government to supervise and regulate the sale and distribution of narcotics to licensed physicians and pharmacists was also passed.

Private Citizen Must Help to Enforce the Law

Governor Cox of Massachusetts has a definite idea about the duty of the people in regard to enforcement of the prohibition law. He says, as recently quoted by the Chicago Herald Examiner:

"Decent citizens must aid in giving evidence against bootleggers, who are selling abominable stuff that drives men crazy, if it does not kill them. It has been fashionable in some quarters to talk about 'favored bootleggers,' but the danger threatened carries the situation beyond any stage for joking."

President Harding Says Eighteenth Amendment Must Be Sustained

With no uncertain note did President Harding sound the call to a steadfast loyalty to the Constitution as amended by the will of the people, when on July Fourth he addressed a great throng of "friends and neighbors" in his home town of Marion, Ohio. In connection with emphasis upon strict law enforcement, he spoke of the Eighteenth Amendment.

"Majorities, restrained to the protection of minorities, ever must rule," he declared. "The Constitution and the laws sponsored by the majority must be enforced. It does not matter who opposes. If an opposing minority has a just objection, the rising tide of public opinion will change the law. There is no abiding liberty under any other plan.

"I mean to sound no note of pessimism. This republic is secure. Menaces do arise, but public opinion will efface them. Meanwhile Government must repress them. The Eighteenth Amendment denies to a minority a fancied sense of personal liberty, but the amendment is the will of America and must be sustained by the Government and public opinion, else contempt for the law will undermine our very foundations."

Pennsylvania County Improved By Prohibition

That he might ascertain the result of prohibition in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, John H. Landis, of Millersville, sent a thousand questionnaires to citizens in every borough and township in the county. Tabulating the replies received, according to the Philadelphia North American, he found that 33 reported as much drinking as there was two years ago, and 704 said there was not; only 19 believed there was as much drunkenness, and 718 reported less; 106 thought that the moral condition of their communities had not improved, while 569 said it was higher; and 191 felt that political conditions were no better, while 423 believed that these, too, had improved.

Prohibition In U. S. Is Termed Miracle

"Prohibition in America is the miracle of the twentieth century, according to Dr. Gifford Gordon of Melbourne, Australia," says the San Francisco Examiner.

"Dr. Gordon was sent to this country ten months ago by the Anti-Liquor League of Australia, to investigate the effect of prohibition and to gather facts to help the Australian campaign for prohibition. He said:

"'I have traveled 16,000 miles in this country and have interviewed judges, police chiefs, bank managers, hospital and jail attaches relative to the prohibition situation. I was greatly impressed with the unanimity of opinion regarding its effectiveness.'"

Prohibition Enforcement Gaining Everywhere

There is a force of Field Supervisors operating from the Washington office of the Federal Prohibition Commissioner, whose duty it is to periodically check directors' offices to see that the work is handled expeditiously and according to regulations; that files, papers and all executive matters are current. This force is rapidly being developed along highly specialized lines and it is hoped will soon become one of the main agencies in effecting a thorough business-like conduct of the directors' offices. In an informal report giving a general summary of the activities of the year which has elapsed since his entering upon his official duties, Commissioner Roy A. Haynes states his belief that it will in time compare favorably with other like agencies in the Government and large commercial organizations.

"Directors have been urged to exert their best efforts in obtaining the support and co-operation of the courts, district attorneys, members of the judiciary and Department of Justice," says the Commissioner.

"The press was also recognized as an important factor in informing the public and arousing the people to the importance of law enforcement, and in this connection directors were requested to obtain the co-operation of the press.

"Directors were to recommend men for agents upon their merits rather than for any other consideration, and urge that agents should always conduct themselves in such a way as to command the respect of all good, law-abiding citizens.

"Taken as a whole, reports from directors show a wonderful improvement all over the United States. The courts are tightening up, it is much easier to secure convictions from juries; judges are meting out in many instances jail and penitentiary sentences of long terms.

"Directors are receiving better co-operation from county, municipal and state officers and court officials, prosecuting attorneys and officials generally.

"Most newspapers, metropolitan and rural, are anxious to print actual news and many are giving valuable aid in upholding our forces in enforcement of the law."

A Dry New Zealand?

Prohibition is sure to come in the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand in a comparatively short time, in the opinion of Bishop Charles Edward Locke, resident bishop of the Philippines for the Methodist Episcopal church. He is now in the United States on a visit, but before journeying to this country spent a month touring Australia and New Zealand.

"Prohibition is fast becoming the question of the hour in New Zealand," said the Bishop.

"The dry forces there are confident of putting it into effect next December. The public is immensely interested. The people are particularly interested in the economic background of the period leading up to our Eighteenth Amendment and since.

"A great deal of propaganda concerning the absolute failure of prohibition in this country has been circulated in New Zealand, as is true in Australia, the Philippines and elsewhere in the Pacific islands where the white man rules. To all appearances this propaganda has come from the wet forces in this country. In New Zealand it has been overdone and the people are beginning to suspect that there is another side to the situation in the United States."

THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION IN PERSPECTIVE

Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, World's and National W. C. T. U. Superintendent Sunday School Work

The largest and most notable Sunday School convention ever held, recently convened in Kansas City, Missouri. There were seven thousand, two hundred registered delegates from every state and province within the International field. These delegates, with the visiting Sunday School workers, gave audiences which were estimated at from twelve to fifteen thousand people, taxing the capacity of their famous convention hall.

The convention was notable in that it marked a new epoch in the history of organized International Sunday School work, by the merging of the two great Sunday School organizations of the country, namely, the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations and the International Sunday School Association, under the new name, "International Sunday School Council of Religious Education."

Significant were the words of Dr. Fletcher Homan, chairman of the local committee of one hundred, as he voiced the welcome of Kansas City: "We welcome you because you are foremost among the promoters of the purity of nations, the preservers of the peace of nations, and the purifiers of the policies of Governments. The building of a holy citizenship, the abolition of unjust war, the destruction of ungodly institutions, are goals that testify to the divineness of your ideals and justify your utmost endeavor. Would national prohibition for the United States and partial prohibition successes in other lands have ever come to pass without your aid?..... Gladly do we receive a mighty host of the builders of the world's best civilization."

Thirty addresses were included in the main convention program, with symposiums introducing many more speakers. All speakers presented were selected from the ablest in the religious educational world and the realm of Sunday School specialists and each had a forceful message calculated to awaken the Home, the Church and the Sunday School to the challenge of the new day when there shall be adequate religious education for every boy and girl.

Prohibition Frequently the Topic for Discussion

Many of the speakers referred directly or indirectly to national prohibition and its value to the youth and to the material welfare of the country. The need of maintaining the Volstead Enforcement Law was emphasized by Wayne B. Wheeler, legal director of the Anti-Saloon League, in a telling address. Hon. William J. Bryan and others referred to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union with words of praise and commendation. Mr. Bryan spoke to the largest audience of the convention, holding it for one and one-half hours by a masterful plea for the Bible and Christianity. He gave his address to countless thousands through the radiophone just previous to its presentation at the Sunday School convention.

The evening programs consisted of music, pageantry and visualization features, all of which are b yond words to describe. The great chorus of five hundred voices and the Rainbow Chorus of five hundred children gave unexcelled music. The pageant of one evening was "Christ, the Light of the World" and the second evening of pageantry was patriotic—all given with wonderful, spectacular and faultless presentation, reflecting great credit upon local leaders.

The educational work of the Sunday School was given a great impetus through the many exhibits to be seen in the concourse and lobby of the hall. The booth of the Sunday School department of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was happily located near one of the entrances to the auditorium. The exhibit had been carefully prepared with the view of showing the varied Sunday School temperance literature and helps published by the National W. C. T. U. and, incidentally, to call attention to the lines of Sunday School temperance work promoted by the department. The literature was exhibited on mounted placards, classified according to divisions and departments. Printed placards occupied conspicuous places: "The Sunday School and Bible Temperance;" "The Sunday School and Anti-Tobacco Work;" "Temperance Sunday is Total Abstinence Decision Day;" "Pledge Signing in the Sunday School;" "The Sunday School and Christian Citizenship;" "World's Temperance Sunday;" "Recognition of Young Voters;" "Anti-Cigaret Sunday;" "The Sunday School and Law Enforcement;" "The Sunday School and Social Service."

Questions concerning these lines of work were answered by the national superintendent who was present (as much as possible) in the booth during the interim between meetings.

Exhibit of the Sunday School Department of the W. C. T. U. Found Most Helpful

A quotation from Marion Lawrence was printed on a large poster and given conspicuous place. It called for Sunday School temperance work to be systematically done in the Sunday School. The aim of the department appeared on another large placard. The motto of the department was also displayed, while a banner told of the achievements of the department. Scriptural temperance mottoes added another significant touch to the exhibit. A part of the Missouri section of the great Sunday School petition, signed by the youth of the country, and presented to Congress, asking for national prohibition, and a large picture of the department headquarters showing the great petition in process of being mounted to send to Washington, were of interest. The American flag was in evidence, and underneath it was the inscription: "A flag for every Sunday School." A large Christian Flag made of the department covenant pledges, signed by Junior pupils as Decision cards, formed an attractive and significant part of the exhibit, as each pupil signing became a member of the church. The globe, encircled by white ribbon, and mounted by the flags of all nations, called attention to the words printed on a placard underneath, "Prohibition for the World," and on another, "The Sunday School must help secure world-wide prohibition." An array of significant posters, including the one, "Total abstinence must still be taught in the Home, the Church, and the School, that prohibition may endure and be enforced," occupied conspicuous places, The pledge chains and flags gave finishing touches to the booth. Great interest was manifested in the prize posters on exhibit, made by Sunday School pupils.

A registration desk provided opportunity for, perhaps, a thousand delegates to register with the department and each one received a package of assorted leaflets, including the department bulletin and a souvenir containing the greetings of the World's and National superintendent, with the aim of the department on the inside of the folder.

"Best Organization on Earth"

As people passed our booth these and other comments were heard: "Wonderful exhibit;" "Just see the temperance supplies;" "Oh, we must register here;" "Best organization on earth."

The hostess of the booth was Mrs G. F. Davis, superintendent of the Sunday School department for Kansas City Federation; her assistant was Mrs. Carrie J. Kaysing. The success of the exhibit is due to the ability and constant attendance of these two women, while representatives from each union gave assistance. Our gratitude is extended to the W. C. T. U. Federation for standing back of the whole enterprise, and particularly to Mrs. Fannie L. Taylor president.

Unexpected recognition was given the World's and National superintendent She was honored by appointment on the Resolutions Committee, and was called to the platform to be presented to the convention. Only a very few were thus honored. As Marion Lawrence introduced her, he remarked: "We owe a debt of gratitude to this woman." Just a few words of greeting from the World's and National W. C. T. U. were given, receiving notable applause.

Resolutions Call for Law Enforcement and Education for Temperance and Christian Citizenship

The goal for the department to reach is embodied in the resolutions which were adopted enthusiastically and unanimously at the convention:

"Inasmuch as the Eighteenth Amendment, adopted by a larger proportionate majority than any other part of our American Constitution, is in the interests of the nation's health, and is based on sound moral, social and economic reasons, we appeal to all good citizens to aid in the enforcement of all laws made to carry it into effect.

"We recommend to lesson writers and denominational publishers that the subjects of Bible temperance and training for Christian citizenship be included in all curricula prepared for week-day religious educational work.

"We favor the continuance in the Uniform Lesson Series of the Quarterly Temperance Lessons, with suitable adaptations in all graded courses, and the maintenance of temperance teaching as one of the points in the international standard of Sunday school efficiency."

Noting them carefully, it will be seen that the convention recommended that provision be made for all temperance teaching heretofore given in uniform and graded lesson series; that temperance teaching be a point in the International Standard of Efficiency for all Sunday Schools and that Bible temperance and

REMINISCENCES FROM THE DAILY ROUTINE OF A W. C. T. U. AMERICANIZATION FIELD WORKER

A. Amy Spalding

No challenge comes to the women of America today so strongly as that of citizenship. A significant feature is added by the presence of the immigrant woman in our midst.

Yes, I know, we think of the immigrant woman as ignorant and queer because she cannot speak our language and does not follow our customs and methods. We think her uncultured because she is devoted to so large a family that she does not take her place in society circles.

I wonder if it ever has occurred to us that we may appear ignorant to such a woman. She may have lived in several countries, and traveled through several others, before arriving in America. She may speak several languages, though not the English. She may be like the young French war-bride in Superior, Wisconsin. When this little woman saw the American people putting on their plates so many articles of food at the same time, she said in disgust, "Why, the American people eat like hogs." She had been accustomed to eating in many courses and only one thing at a time. Many children? Yes, but that immigrant mother certainly has the patience and cheerful disposition equaled only by our own great-grandmothers. She may cook pastries and produce needlework of which we might be proud.

One of the Wisconsin women invited her Russian neighbor, with a group of her friends, to tea one afternoon. The table was set beforehand and in an effort to make her Russian friend feel more at home, she explained that in the two-handled cups she was going to serve "soup" (choosing that word because she thought bouillon would be too hard a term to understand). A little later her Russian guest confided, "In my country when we have cups with two handles we call it bouillon."

So long as we are too busy to get acquainted with our foreign-born neighbor, she will seem to us queer and ignorant. But for the woman who wants to broaden herself and has a heart of sympathy and a will to serve, there are many happy surprises in store.

One of the most interesting features of American life is the foreign community, while an appalling reflection upon us as American people is our ignorance of that same community. Fancy your field worker coming to a small city, and in her hasty effort to get in touch with the situation, calling upon some Assyrian people, whom no one seems to know anything about other than that the father and husband of one family conducts a cafe, though everyone is agreed that they need Americanizing. At the first home where she calls she is met at the door by an immaculately neat little woman, strikingly pretty, who greets her in a soft, gentle tone of voice, and with a dignity and courtesy pleasant to behold, invites her to come in. She learns, upon a few minutes' conversation, that this woman is a graduate of a large university in Asia, spoke English before coming to America, has lived in the city for three years, sings and plays quite well, and makes beautiful filet lace. The field worker finds, by inquiring of a number of leading women in many organizations, that not one has ever called on this woman, or knows a thing about her—what a loss to the community! Who needs the Americanizing?

This same field worker is told that a group of Russian-German people are very clannish. With the president of the union she immediately calls upon their pastor, a splendid young man, a graduate of Northwestern University, whose wife is also very pleasant and cordial. They tell their callers a romantic story of a peasant people who were taken from Germany to Russia at the pleasure of Queen Catherine, and again came back to Germany later but were strangers in their own country. They had come to America about 1905. Here they were called "blockheads" and "foreigners" and ignored on every hand. They now have their own homes and gardens and have learned to get along without the society of the American people. Upon walking through this section of the city the next morning, after quite a deep snowfall, the field worker noted every sidewalk swept clean, while in the part of the city where the American (so-called) people lived, she had to wade along as best she could.

What are the happy surprises in your community? Is it the living embodiment of poetry and art in the form of a little Polish girl, an only child, such as the writer recently met, or an Assyrian lady of royal birth, with striking intellect and charming conversational ability, or is it the peasant type, which is furnishing the thrift, the toil, and sweat, and endurance, and stoicism upon which civilizations are founded. It may be a Carnegie, or a Jacob Riis, or a Mary Antin.

Let us not be provincial. We cannot be citizens of a state any longer. We must rise to the status of world citizenship, to which our immigrant neighbor challenges us. We must leave race prejudices in the background, remembering only that God has called us to serve humanity and has said, "The stranger that dwelleth with you, shall be unto you as one that is born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself."

A Dress Form Demonstration

Clara Ansorge Fuller

Deftly the hostess wields broom and dust-cloth, and by noon the Center is a model of cleanliness and cheer. The supervisor drops in from her morning's teaching in the homes, bringing with her a box of new slides for the stereomotorgraph. Directly after lunch, a knock at the door announces the arrival of a cheerful little French woman, who makes the trip on the interurban twice a week, bringing with her her young son, who always entertains himself on the floor of the dining-room with a large box of toys kept for the purpose. A French war-bride and two Italian women appear shortly. The hostess teaches this class, while the supervisor re-fills the picture machine and welcomes late comers.

This is the day for the dress form demonstration. In quick succession arrive the two young women from the Home Economics department of the University, who are to demonstrate; the woman for whom the form is to be made; women from the hill who have seen the notice in the weekly paper published in the district; and three other foreign women who have come many miles, in response to written invitations.

The young ladies dress the model in a knitted undervest in place of her blouse, and are soon busy pasting strips of gummed paper up and down, and round and round. As the work progresses, the talk goes merrily on in the audience. The activities of the Center are explained, and inquiries made for names of women who might like to take lessons either at the Center, or at their homes. The address of a Spanish woman with six girls, the oldest ten years old, is secured; manifestly, she must have home lessons.

The model bears herself well as the time slips by, and under the skilful fingers, the form grows until, in less than two hours, it is complete and ready to be cut down the front and back.

The audience breathes a sigh of relief in sympathy with the model who has stood so long and quietly. At a small expense, she now has a form that she can use when doing her own dressmaking.

"SOCICIANS" ASSEMBLE TO STUDY SOCIAL SERVICE

FORTY-NINTH ANNUAL MEETING NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF SOCIAL WORK, PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND, JUNE 22-29.

Elizabeth A. Perkins, National Director Department Child Welfare

Beginning with the evening session of the Conference of Social Work, on June 22, until the closing evening meeting, June 29, more than 4,000 delegates rushed frantically from one meeting to another in an effort to keep up with at least a part of the program of this forty-ninth annual gathering. On the first morning of the conference, delegates, young, middle-aged and old, could be seen scanning the daily bulletin and questioning, "Shall I go to the Mathewson St. M. E. Church to hear 'Recreational Work in Institutions' or to the First Congregational Church to hear 'Industrial Hygiene', or to the Providence Opera House for the 'Significance of the Rise in Relief-Giving During the Past Five Years', or to the Grace Episcopal Church for 'Social Standards for Industry', or to Sayles Hall for 'Existing Social Courses of the Community'?"—all these different programs having the two-hour period from nine o'clock a. m. to 10:55 a. m., and an equal number of gatherings for consideration of varied topics being held during the following period from eleven until one.

With the ten sectional meetings held every morning from nine o'clock until one, and the afternoons given over to meetings of individual organizations affiliated with the national conferences, with breakfasts, luncheons and dinners devoted to special committee meetings, with an evening general session followed by a publicity gathering from ten until eleven, the life of the delegate during this national conference was somewhat strenuous.

DIVISIONS

The National Conference of Social Work included ten special divisions covering: 1, Children; 2, Delinquents and Correction; 3, Health; 4, The Family; 5, Industrial and Economic Problems; 6, Neighborhood and Community Life; 7, Mental Hygiene; 8, Organization of Social Forces; 9, Public Officials and Administration; 10, The Immigrant.

KINDRED GROUPS

Kindred groups holding special meetings during this conference included:

American Association for Community Organization; American Association for Organizing Family Social Work; American Association of Hospital Social Workers; American Association of Social Workers; American Red Cross; Child Welfare League of America; Intercity Conference on Illegitimacy; National Association of Policewomen; National Association of Travellers' Aid Societies; National Association of Visiting Teachers and Home and School Visitors; National Child Labor Committee; National Children's Home and Welfare Association; National Conference of Jewish Social Service; National Probation Association; Social Service Department of Protestant Episcopal Church.

"WHO WAS WHO" IN THIS CONFERENCE

Prominent in this conference were many government and state officials, editors of magazines and papers, presidents and secretaries of boards of charities, state boards of health, middle-aged men and women for many years active in both volunteer and public social agencies, young women and men just from college anxious for training in social work.

These social workers were variously titled as welfare workers, real optimists, modern altruists, practical idealists, and finally as socicians (pronounced like physician) this word being coined by Arthur Guild of Toledo, Ohio. Therefore, remember, "When in trouble consult a socician."

Canada sent a delegation numbering twenty-one; the two delegates registering as coming the longest distance were from France. The youngest member of the conference was Miss Nina Louise Putnam of Charlestown, West Virginia, eleven years of age. Nina is the daughter of L. H. Putnam, executive secretary of the West Virginia State Board of Children's Guardians and this is the third year she has saved her own money to come to the conference as a delegate.

Dr. Valeria Parker, Washington, D. C., national director of the department of Social Morality, and Mrs. Martha P. Falconer, her associate; Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of the department of Child Welfare, and Mrs. Olive C. Barnes, president of West Virginia W. C. T. U., were among the members of the W. C. T. U. present at this great gathering.

A resolution favoring the Eighteenth Amendment was unanimously adopted by the American Association for Organizing Family Social Work at its meeting in Providence, June 22.

PUBLICITY CONFERENCES

Each morning during the conference publicity enthusiasts gathered for a get-together breakfast, to take up matters of publicity; including newspaper and magazine publicity, exhibits, moving pictures, or any machinery by which big programs or ideas may be gotten before the public. Special luncheons and dinners were also made publicity get-together sessions. Every afternoon of the conference publicity problems of national and state organization, or publicity clinics, or some demonstration of feature publicity was taken up.

OPENING ADDRESS BY ROBERT W. KELSO, PRESIDENT

Robert W. Kelso, President of the National Conference of Social Work, spoke on the evening of June 22, sounding a call for recruits to the new philosophy of social and industrial welfare—the philosophy of the responsibility of the community to the individual as well as the responsibility of the individual to the community. The social workers were welcomed to Providence by Mayor Gainer, President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University, and T. F. I. McDonnell, chairman of the local Conference Committee. All evening meetings were held on the beautiful campus of Brown University where now and again the sweet singing of birds mingled with the voices of the speakers.

WASTE OF CHILD LABOR A BLIGHT MORE DEPLORABLE THAN WAR, SAYS HERBERT HOOVER

The largest audience of the conference greeted Herbert Clark Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, social worker and administrator of the greatest relief organization which the world has ever known. Mr. Hoover said: "There are one or two points on which I would like to touch with some emphasis. One of them is this problem of child labor which now again forces itself into the fields of emergent action. Every well wisher of children must feel deeply the failure of the last effort in national prevention of child labor.

"A study of the situation as it stands will show that a majority of states have forward-looking and effective laws for child protection; that some others have enacted legislation that at least goes part way but there is a minority that are still in the middle ages in their attitude toward childhood.

"Child labor in these backward states is competitively unfair to industry in the states that have responded to the moral and social ideals of the American people. But far beyond this, the moral and economic results of debilitated and illiterate and untrained manhood and womanhood that must spring from these cesspools where child labor is encouraged and is legitimate, infect the entire nation.

"All of us would agree in the wish that the sense of local government and local responsibility in our country were such that each and every state would advance itself to the forefront of progress in this so vital a question. However, if it is impossible to secure this necessary safeguard to our children by local governments, I am one of those to consider the losses in our sense of local responsibility as less than the losses to the nation as a whole, and if all else fails, I wish to stand with you in securing a Federal amendment."

PUBLIC HEALTH

Public health is governmental responsibility. Perhaps no more valuable address was given at this conference than that delivered by Dr. George E. Vincent, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, on the problems of health that confront the American people and the world. The question of public health is basically international.

Dr. Vincent also forcefully urged that public health workers devote their energies to finding some means of co-ordinating international work. He told his auditors it was impossible to solve their own health problems without taking into consideration the health of other peoples. He called attention to the sight which confronted him when he visited China where thousands of women and children were slaving in the cotton mills of Shanghai under indescribable conditions, and asked if there was not some connection between the health status of those people and that of the women and children who toil in Rhode Island mills.

THE CONFERENCE SERMON

"We must see each man not as a tree walking but as a child of God."

The conference sermon was given by Dr. Frank Nelson of Cincinnati, Ohio, and was a plea for social service workers to look upon men as men, not as trees walking but as children of God, as individuals, and to look through the things that cloud the essential man from them that the real man may be seen with a spirit of reverence.

In the introduction to his address Dr. Nelson declared "that after all these centuries of the existence of life in the world any man who faces life as it is does not avoid facts by considering theories alone. The task of human service is the most exhausting of tasks. It demands spiritual energy, enthusiasm, imagination, and imposes on our own passions and wills the necessity of restraint.

PROHIBITION A FAILURE IN OKLAHOMA?

Recently Governor Robertson of Oklahoma made statements derogatory to the prohibition laws as enforced in his own state, saying, "You can get corn whisky in every county in the state. You can't go to a picnic without some fellow having a load of it on his hip," and added other similar charges.

Mrs. Josephine M. Buhl, president of the Oklahoma W. C. T. U., wrote to several representative and prominent citizens of the state, asking their opinion on the value of prohibition and its enforcement. Their answers are interesting and enlightening, and are not at all in harmony with the assertion of the chief executive. We quote from these letters:

Department of Labor Strong for Eighteenth Amendment

I do not feel that I am capable of finding language sufficiently strong to express my belief in the good things that prohibition has brought to our state.

Having had a number of years' personal experience as a drinking man, during which time I believe every conceivable kind and quality of whisky and alcoholic drinks were given a fair trial, and having discontinued the habit a little more than eleven years ago, I feel that I am in a position to know something about the effect of our prohibition laws. In my opinion those who criticise the prohibition laws and the effect they have had upon the citizenship of our state and nation, fail to take into consideration the important things they have accomplished. A large percentage of the people with whom this office comes in contact are generally referred to as laborers.

I have had occasion personally to notice the difference in conditions affecting this class of our citizenship, in Texas before prohibition and in Oklahoma since it became operative, and I know that fully ninety per cent of the working class of people under the present arrangement spend the money they earn for the things necessary for bettering the conditions of their homes and their families, whereas before prohibition became effective a large percentage of this class of people spent the larger share, and in many cases, all of their earnings in the saloon.

While it is true that there are discouraging problems in connection with the enforcement of prohibition laws, I have discussed this matter with a number of county attorneys in different sections of the state, and the almost universal opinion of these officials is that it is only a matter of a short time until the illicit liquor distillery will be curbed and put out of business. In fact, in some places the authorities have the problem well under control, and if the state and government should at this time become lax in the enforcement of these laws it would be nothing short of a calamity and equivalent to saying that the people are incapable of self-government. I do not believe that the people are incapable of self-government and we must not, for a moment, become discouraged, to the point of allowing the vicious and lawless element to control the destiny of our people and set up the standards for our citizenship.

CLAUDE E. CONNALLY,
Commissioner of Labor.

Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune (Richard Lloyd Jones, Editor), for the Dry Law

Behind all the noise made by the patrons of bootleggers, behind all the talk that "more drinking is going on than ever before," stand the cold, hard facts of the benefits the country as a whole has already experienced because of prohibition. Granted that in some would-be smart circles a great deal of drinking is still going on, and a great deal of illicit trade, it is still true that outside of these noisy circles less drinking is being done than ever before, and that that little is decreasing as private stocks fade away and as knowledge of poisoned booze spreads among the people.

The health of the people was better last year than ever before. The period of depression caused less pauperism and misery because more people had savings than ever before. Crime though prevalent is less so than in drinking countries.

Sapulpa Chief of Police Declares Homes are Law-Abiding

I feel that the statement of Governor Robertson is erroneous. As a peace officer I find that the homes of Oklahoma are considered among the very best in the United States and I do not believe that I could honestly say that one-half of one per cent of the homes of our community have liquor of any kind in the household. At present I feel that Oklahoma is progressing along the line of prohibition, and the officers of the state and Federal government are exerting every possible effort to keep this a good state and to uphold prohibition in every respect.

R. R. MOREY,
Chief of Police, City of Sapulpa.

Oklahoma Educator Extols Prohibition

One of the greatest results of the world war was the advancement of national prohibition. The greatest piece of constructive work since the foundation of our government is the Eighteenth Amendment. I think we have succeeded very well in the enforcement of the prohibition law when we think of the distance between the extremities of the open saloon and legal prohibition. There is no comparison between the danger of the conflict with a chained lion and one turned loose, and as the years pass by and the bonded warehouses become depleted of their stock and nature makes disposition of those who insist on drinking, we will have less trouble in enforcing this great law. I am heart and soul in this great work, and pledge you every atom of my ability in assisting in law enforcement.

G. W. AUSTIN,
President Oklahoma College of Women,
Chickasha, Okla.

President W. C. T. U. Scouts Governor's Statements

Governor Robertson says that you can't go to a "party or get-together of any kind without somebody having some corn on his hip." I don't know what strata of society claims the governor's presence, but I do know that I have been feasted and entertained in the mining sections of the northeast, the cotton fields of the south, the oil fields in the center, and the short-grass country of the northwest, and never have I been proffered anything from the "hip." Praise God, the day of absolute prohibition is near at hand, with only one thing between us and victory—the indifference and apathy of the Christian people towards the prohibition cause. It's going to take more than the feeble voice of Oklahoma's governor to raise John Barleycorn from his grave!

MRS. JOSEPHINE M. BUHL,
President state W. C. T. U.

Vast Majority of Citizens Favor Dry Law, Says Attorney General's Office

The phase of the prohibition question at this time being generally discussed is that of the success or failure of the Federal legislation called the Volstead Act. In that connection it is well to remember that Oklahoma was dry long before the enactment of that act, in fact we have a set of laws dealing with the use, possession of and traffic in intoxicating liquors unequaled for stringency by any other state in the Union, so that to Oklahoma as a state the success or failure of the Volstead legislation would have little effect upon its prohibition status.

The truth to my mind concerning the Volstead Act is simply this: The passage of the Federal Act seemingly, to some degree, shifted the enforcement responsibility from the shoulders of the local enforcement officers to the Federal department, whose facilities were sadly inadequate for so colossal a task. As a result, there occurred a seeming laxity in law enforcement, which some people mistakenly believed to be a failure of the principle of prohibition. As soon as the local and Federal officers began to get their proper adjustment, so as to cooperate with each other, a change took place, and while it is true, probably, concerning the liquor traffic, as it is true of any evil thing in the last throes of its existence, that for a short space it seemed to gain renewed life, and that more intoxicating liquor has been made in this state since the cutting off of the foreign supply, IT IS NOT TRUE THAT MORE LIQUOR HAS BEEN SOLD HERE NOR HAS MORE INTOXICATION BEEN APPARENT. OUR OFFICERS ARE SLOWLY BUT SURELY CLOSING IN ON THE HOME BREW MANUFACTURERS AND OUR COURT RECORDS CERTAINLY WILL SHOW A MAMMOTH DECREASE IN OFFENSES COMMITTED IN VIOLATION OF OUR INTOXICATING LIQUOR LAWS.

THE VAST MAJORITY OF THE PEOPLE OF OKLAHOMA RECOGNIZE AND ARE GRATEFUL FOR THE BLESSINGS OF PROHIBITION, AND EXEMPLIFY SOBRIETY IN THEIR PRIVATE LIFE. If this had not been true, we never could have enacted the prohibition measures which have become an important part of the laws of our state. If it were not true at present we could not keep upon our statute books those same measures.

K. VAN LUNEN,
Assistant Attorney General.

Mrs. E. J. Simonds, the newly elected president of the W. C. T. U. of Cuba, and her husband, were callers at National Headquarters last week, and report growing interest in the anti-alcohol movement in their country.

Dr. Hercod Extols Prohibition

Among the distinguished visitors at National Headquarters recently was Dr. Robert Hercod, head of the International Bureau Against Alcoholism. Dr. Hercod is in the United States making a study of the effect of prohibition. He is most enthusiastic in his expressions of appreciation of the change wrought by the dry law, and says he is "overwhelmed with admiration for the manner in which the Americans have coped with the prohibition situation." As to the difference between liquor-drinking Europe and prohibition America, he declares there is no comparison, the conditions in this country are immeasurably better.

Dr. Hercod told of the false propaganda and misinformation about prohibition that has been spread abroad in Europe, but said that after personal investigation, even though it has not been efficiently enforced in some centers, on his return he must report that America is now a better country since the outlawing of the saloon. "I have been struck everywhere by the fact that the keenest observers have told me that prohibition has been a success from an economic point of view," said the doctor. "As a whole I believe the Americans are happier and healthier than they were when they drank in the open saloons."

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES AND OTHER INFLUENTIAL ORGANIZATIONS

W. C. T. U. speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

(Through your local papers give wide-spread publicity to the resolutions thus secured.)

A Significant Silence

There could be no more complete refutation of the claims of certain labor leaders that organized labor as a whole is clamoring for the return of beer and wine than the silence on the subject that prevailed throughout the recent annual convention of the National Federation of Labor. The inference was plain—there was so large a dry element among the delegates present that the pro-beer leaders dared not permit the subject to be brought up for discussion and vote.

It is an insult to the members of the Federation to believe that in the face of the rapidly accumulating evidence of the benefits they have received from prohibition, they would vote to nullify the law. Had the will of the intelligent majority of the delegates to the convention ruled, we doubt not there would have been passed a resolution similar to that adopted by the National Women's Trade Union, which stood unequivocally for the Eighteenth Amendment through laws passed by Congress for that purpose.

How About That Prohibition Column In Your Papers?

We took as our slogan at the beginning of the year, "A Prohibition Column in Every Newspaper." In some communities we have realized this ambition. Even the pro-beer papers when furnished with up-to-date, live, authentic facts showing the benefits of prohibition have published them. How is it in your city? Are you co-operating with your newspapers in an effort to supply your fellow citizens with evidence that will convince them of the value of prohibition to the home, the school, society and the nation? THE UNION SIGNAL gives each week at least a page of facts which are indisputable proof that prohibition is worth while. We secure and assemble the evidence; it is your duty to see that it reaches the people through your local press.

Betray That Sacred Memory? Never!

Who shall estimate the far-reaching influence of the work of the pioneers, through whose faithfulness, sacrifice and prayers there was built up a public sentiment against the drink evil that later was crystallized into prohibition legislation? On the minds of countless young people this steadfastness to a great principle made an indelible impression which strengthened them to resist temptation. Elizabeth Cheney, writing in The Christian Advocate, tells an incident very much in point, which occurred on shipboard:

"At dinner on the last night of the voyage, the waiters came in bringing champagne for everyone. It was the captain's 'treat'. Before I realized what was happening, the long-stemmed delicate glass on my right was brimming with golden wine and crystal bubbles. 'You must drink this with us!' said my little signora. 'But I do not want it,' I replied. 'O, but you know it will be a discourtesy not to take it, just this one glass, from our captain, you know.' Now I had not the least desire for the wine, nor any intention of drinking it. There was simply a momentary temptation not to appear rude and ill-bred. I sat looking at the glass as all began to drink to the captain's health, and I saw clearly mirrored in the amber a little group of women on their knees. It was reflected from the picture gallery of memory, just a typical group of such small afternoon gatherings as went on for years once a week all over the United States. Only a few women, often only two or three, to outward seeming a forlorn hope, but holding on to the promises of God, and pleading for deliverance from the national curse of strong drink. It was like the breath of newly-born Christianity against the granite walls of pagan Rome. I could not betray that memory for a bit of shipboard etiquette."

The present days offer many temptations to betray this sacred memory, not indeed by indulgence in the forbidden drink but by failing to live up to the high standards of perseverance, zeal and unceasing work and prayer for the enforcement of the law which these pioneers labored to secure.

It is our privilege, as it is our obligation, to hold high the torch lighted by these sainted leaders until it shall illumine the whole world.

Wine As A Beverage Not Necessary In France

One of our subscribers desires us to answer the question, asked by a friend whether, because of the lack of pure water, there is absolute necessity for drinking wine while traveling through France.

Speaking from our own recent personal experience, we hasten to reassure our correspondent. The fairy tale of wine being necessary because of lack of water in southern Europe is without foundation. Not only is good, pure water to be secured at the hotels by the simple asking, but in many instances it will be provided to the American tourists without any suggestion on their part, so accustomed are the continental hotel people to the desire of Americans for the H^2O beverage. On the trains, bottled mineral waters can be purchased, and even in southern Italy the total abstainer has no difficulty in quenching his thirst with Nature's refreshing beverage.

Cleaning Up the Movies

Some people are interested in deep subjects, others in just the opposite, but it might be difficult to find another topic of such universal interest as moving pictures. And since Mr. Will H. Hays left his duties in the President's cabinet to become director of the cinema industry, the eyes of all America have been upon him, with the hope that he would be able to make the pictures safe for the youth of the land.

It was, therefore, with a great deal of pleasure as well as interest, that the delegates and visitors to the General Federation of Women's Clubs, recently assembled at Chautauqua, New York, listened to an address by Mr. Hays, in which he told of his intention to have motion pictures made clean at their source. "There is one place and one place only where the evils can be eliminated and the good and great advantage of motion pictures retained," the press quotes Mr. Hays as saying, "and that is at the point where and when the pictures are made. It can be done then and there. The correction can be made; real evil can and must be kept out. The highest standard of art and morals can be achieved, and it is primarily the duty of the producers to do it."

That these words were not merely for publicity may be seen by the letter the new director sent out early in May to the presidents of the most prominent motion picture corporations. Quoting the Articles of Association which state that the object of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America is "to foster the common interest of those engaged in the motion picture industry in the United States, BY ESTABLISHING AND MAINTAINING THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE MORAL AND ARTISTIC STANDARDS IN MOTION PICTURE PRODUCTION, by developing the educative as well as the entertainment value and the general usefulness of the motion picture, by diffusing accurate and reliable information with reference to the industry, by reforming abuses relative to the industry, by securing freedom from unjust or unlawful exactions, and by other lawful and proper means," Mr. Hays reminds the producers that they can "make the greatest immediate progress in 'ESTABLISHING AND MAINTAINING THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE MORAL AND ARTISTIC STANDARD OF MOTION PICTURE PRODUCTION,' if those charged with the responsibilities in connection with the production now in progress make certain that they do strive for this very thing."

"These pictures now being made will come out soon," continued Mr. Hays, "and they will be the proof either of our honesty of purpose or of our failure; they will be the proof either of our ability to correct our evils ourselves, or of our inability to run our own business. There is nothing in which we can possibly be engaged which is of as much importance to the success of our efforts as to make certain that these very pictures, the first pictures made after the organization of the Association, shall clearly show successful effort toward 'ESTABLISHING AND MAINTAINING THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE MORAL AND ARTISTIC STANDARD.' I cannot too strongly urge you to make certain that everything possible shall be done toward that end."

The intention of these corporations to co-operate is shown in the posting of Mr. Hays' letter in a conspicuous place in Universal City, together with one from the president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, Carl Laemmle, notifying the employes that he intends to carry out the entire spirit of Mr. Hays' remarks. Mr. Laemmle says, in part:

"Since, as Mr. Hays says, the whole industry will be judged BY THE PICTURES NOW BEING MADE AND HEREAFTER TO BE MADE, the Universal does not propose to make any picture, OR ANY SCENE IN ANY PICTURE, which can in any way bring condemnation upon the Universal or upon the picture business.

"Our record has been good in the past, but we now intend to make it ONE HUNDRED PER CENT GOOD, and I herewith serve friendly notice upon each and every Universal employe, from the highest to the lowest, that I shall not be satisfied with anything less than one hundred per cent of co-operation along this line.

"Read Mr. Hays' letter carefully and remember that every word of it means business; and the Universal intends to stand back of it to the limit."

Another step in the endeavor to "make good" is the establishment in Hollywood by the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation of a school for its players. Under Mr. Zukor's plan, all the players and other members of the staff will attend the classes in the school, and reports are to be made weekly to the officers of the company, not only on attainment in the scholarship of the screen, but in deportment in and out of the studios. Members of the company are advised concerning the guarding of their health through such means as proper exercise, sufficient sleep, fresh air and proper diet; told to avoid alcoholic stimulants and late hours, as well as to watch out for general deportment; and instructed to read good books and the newpapers with the idea of keeping abreast of developments in politics, literature, economics, and art.

With the various companies uniting in pushing similar programs, we may confidently look forward to an era when the motion picture industry will be not only a medium of amusement, but of the highest educational and moral value as well.

Why?

"The small wet minority persists in regarding itself as an abused and tricked and therefore rebellious majority. Why is it?" asks Chester Rowell in the San Francisco Bulletin. He proceeds to answer his own question:

"Doubtless because this minority is largely concentrated in a few places, where it is a local majority, and these few places are the most provincial in America. They do not even know that they are different from the rest of the country, nor realize that there is a rest of the country to differ from. Also, they are the source whence come all the cartoons, all the jokes and all the vaudeville performers. So they spread the atmosphere of Broadway and Market street through all the stock joke channels. These jokes are meaningless in most of the country, but they go."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Sacrificial Life is Born, Not of Caprice, but of Abiding Principle

The lack of principle makes any life a thing of tags and ends, of shreds and patches; it is consistent principle which makes life a vesture without seam. That is true of the entire circle of human relationships. No sovereign principle, no steady stream of service. And so it is in the more inward realms of offering and service in the kingdom of our Lord. If there be no abiding principle life will be characterized by moral spasms, by feverish eruption, by arbitrariness and caprice; there will be no uniform glow, no consistent sacrifice. The abiding principle may be devotion to a sentiment, or devotion to an ideal, or devotion to a moral crusade, or devotion to a great and commanding personality. Everybody knows, for it is the sublime commonplace of Christian teaching, that in the realm of the Kingdom the abiding principle is love and devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ. It is in loyalty to Him, in affection for Him, that we find the source of Christian liberality and sacrifice. "We love, because He first loved us." This is the assured and certain order. It is devotion to the Christ that opens out the central depths and channels of the life, and springs of vitality are loosed in strong and ceaseless service.

—Rev. J. H. Jowett.

O God, the giver of all good, bountiful and free in all Thy benefactions, we thank Thee for the sunshine and the rain, for springtime and for autumn, for day and night. We thank Thee for the earth, which is Thy storehouse, for intellect, for moral natures. We thank Thee for grace, and for eternal life. Grant that our lives may show forth Thy praise! In Christ's name. Amen.—Record of Christian Work.

RED LETTER DAYS

July 21—Loyal Temperance Legion Day (Birthday of Anna A. Gordon).

A Dress Form Demonstration

After the others have left, the party of foreign women who have come the longest distance, stop for more friendly conversation, and are served tea and cake.

"My husband will get papers, his second papers, as soon as he can, but there is no teacher near us. What can we do?"

"I will get you books from the travelling library," volunteers the supervisor, "and write a letter of introduction to the chairman of the Y. M. C. A. Naturalization Committee. He will be glad to help and advise your husband."

"How does your husband like our dry law?" is asked.

"Sure we like. So much more money for me," says one.

"Oh, yes, dry law all right. My husband used to take some beer, not now. I wish dry law twenty year ago."

"Yes, dry law good. I no want my boy to drink."

Darkness is falling, and goodbyes are spoken. The supervisor leaves and the hostess lights the rooms and stirs the fires, for she must get her dinner and have all in readiness at seven o'clock, for the evening class.

Tribute to Our Americanization Workers

Adrianna Hungerford, President Colorado W. C. T. U.

The following article appeared in the paper published by the pupils of Cheltenham School, Denver, Colorado, and was written by two girls whose mothers are being taught by volunteer W. C. T. U. teachers:

"The purpose of Americanization is to make good American citizens of the foreign-born by teaching the English language, American customs and American ideals; by giving them a broader and easier view of life. This idea is not only helpful to these foreigners, but also to the American nation as a whole, because in their gratitude to the United States they will become law-abiding and loyal citizens. Many of these foreigners cannot attend night school because of pressing home duties; therefore, there are volunteers who are willing to go into their homes, teaching them the necessary things they are lacking. There is a department in every foreign district in Denver under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. Cheltenham is a fine example of this, with Mrs. Maguire as a volunteer. Italians, Mexicans, Jews, etc., all show their gratitude by becoming industrious and law-respecting citizens. To our intimate knowledge we are positive that the organization will never have cause to regret its generosity.

"Eva Rosen,
"Anna Snyder."

An Americanization Venture

Barbara H. Wylie, State Corresponding Secretary, North Dakota

When Miss Amy Spalding of the Americanization Department was coming to North Dakota, we wondered where she could do the most good. Last year she had attended all the district conventions, presenting the theory of the work in a very impressive way.

Selecting two counties where the foreign problem is large, and gaining the ready consent of the county superintendents of schools, Mrs. Christine Scott Haibeck and Miss Harriett E. Perry, to take Miss Spalding with them in their automobiles, a week was spent in each county. Thirteen districts were visited and the school directors interviewed, many of these themselves foreigners. Night schools were advocated and the idea was heartily welcomed, some of the directors offering to attend.

Miss Minnie Neilson, state superintendent of public instruction, had an interview with Miss Spalding and is very enthusiastic over this kind of work. She agrees with us that the only way to reach all our foreigners is through the public schools and she suggests that we co-operate with the department of Education in keeping a woman at work in the foreign territory all the year. Already we are planning as to how this may be done.

Miss Spalding drove several hundred miles, spoke at a meeting of school directors for Kidder county and also at commencement exercises at Tuttle. On each Sunday she gave helpful addresses. Her work was most satisfactory and we are thankful to Mother National for this valuable loan.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Ohio's Y. P. B. Convention Has as Speakers, Presidents of the World, the National, the State, the County and Local W. C. T. U's

Hessie W. Leybourn

The tenth annual convention of the Ohio Young People's Branch, held in Toledo, Ohio, June 26-29, had the distinction of having for its guests the president of the World's and National organizations, as well as those of the state, the county and several local unions. It was full of pep and interest from beginning to end.

The meetings were presided over by the efficient president, Raymond N. Howard. A banquet and birthday party in celebration of the tenth anniversary of the Branch, was held the first evening. Miss Grace Lehentaler and Miss Ruth Hadley gave reminiscences and D. Hayden Parry read a very interesting letter from Miss Ruth Jarman, who was unable to be present. Three-minute speeches were made by a number of young people, and one of the pleasant features was the cutting of the "birthday cake" by Mrs. Fannie Drummond, national Y. P. B. field secretary and general secretary of the Ohio Y. P. B.

Among the honored guests present were: Miss Anna A. Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U. and acting president of the World's W. C. T. U.; Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national general Y. P. B. secretary; Miss Rebecca N. Rhoads, national superintendent Social Welfare; Mrs. Florence D. Richard, president Ohio W. C. T. U.; Mrs. Frances E. Fuller, treasurer Ohio W. C. T. U.; Mrs. Vincent, wife of the pastor of the convention church.

Bernard F. Brough, mayor of Toledo, and Miss Rhoads were among the speakers on Tuesday.

At the close of the business session the young people went in busses to Walbridge Park, on the Maumee River, where they visited the "zoo." Later a picnic supper was served by the W. C. T. U. committee.

The evening session was held at the church, and inspiring addresses were given by Miss Anna A Gordon and Mrs. Maude B. Perkins.

"Prohibition is going all around the world," Miss Gordon declared, "and it will be judged largely by its effects in the United States. We must prevent the election of wet Congressmen and wet members of the state legislatures. Those who are trying to get back wines and beer are controlled by appetite and avarice. We must defeat them in their unpatriotic efforts." Miss Gordon urged the young people to go in large numbers to meetings of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, to occupy front seats, and to be prepared with facts to refute the misstatements that are made.

Mrs. Perkins pleaded with the young people to work harder than ever to keep prohibition and to help spread it throughout the world, characterizing it as the legacy of this generation. "Work for the election of officials who will stand for enforcement of law," she advised. "The world looks to the young people as never before for the final solution of the alcohol problem."

Mrs. Richard, Mrs. Fuller and Mrs. Viola D. Romans, vice-president of the Ohio W. C. T. U., were the speakers on Wednesday evening. Each had a message of cheer and encouragement for the enterprising young men and women of the Ohio Y. P. B., and emphasized what other speakers had said regarding law enforcement and the election of dry candidates this fall.

Delegates were present from Indiana and Michigan, as well as from Ohio, and several came from the new Y. P. B. organized in Toledo the day before the convention opened.

A high tribute was paid to the Y. P. B. by Rev. McLeod Smith, secretary of the Toledo Council of Churches, who told the young people they represent 100 per cent Americans.

Mrs. Fuller gave a recipe for a colorful life: "Keep in the pink of condition, lead a pure life; do things up brown; treat people white; be well read; go out under God's blue, and on His green."

Mrs. Lulu Gleason, president of Lucas county W. C. T. U., received the prize for organizing more Y. P. B.'s than any other county president in the state.

The catalogs and samples of literature sent from National W. C. T. U. Headquarters by Mrs. Margaret B. Platt, editor and promoter of literature, were much appreciated, as were the greetings which accompanied them. The catalogs were eagerly accepted by the young people, and we trust "Mother National" will receive some nice large orders in the near future. Greetings and best wishes of the convention, together with a message of thanks and appreciation, were sent to National Headquarters.

The convention closed with a diamond medal contest, in which Walter McKinley, of Toledo, was the winner. The presentation speech was made by Mrs. Romans. Diplomas were given graduates in the study course.

Miss Marguerite Brown, recording secretary of the Ohio Y. P. B., showed marked ability for taking notes, and her reports were a fine feature of the convention. The excellent reports of work done during the year, given by superintendents and officers, shows their capability for doing things.

Our Rally Cry

5,000 New Members, 500 New Branches, and 500,000 Signatures to the Polyglot Petition.

Why Not Try This?

Margaret B. Platt

Everybody loves a good time. Why not make the social hour a good time with a threefold purpose, viz, to help someone else have a good time, to give some one else an arrest of thought along best lines, and to have a good time ourselves?

Why not announce that at the next Y. P. B. meeting the social hour will be devoted to preparing American Maid Scrap Books for distribution in hospitals (especially hospitals for disabled soldiers and sailors), in Veterans' homes, Children's Homes, to the Home Centers or "Tarry-a-Whiles" for soldiers and sailors, and to shut-ins everywhere. These scrap-books are 5x6 inches in size and contain 14 pages; pasteboard cover prettily decorated with the U. S. colors and picture of an "American Maid." Prevailing color, battleship gray. They are to be filled with appropriate kodak views, prose, verse, wit and wisdom.

Let each one come equipped with a good assortment of selections, a paste-bottle and brush and a firm resolve to make each book prepared something to be remembered by those who read it and a credit to the Y. P. B. whose gift it is. A suitable inscription could be written and pasted on the front inside cover and a suitable leaflet or two, setting forth the principles and purpose of the Y. P. B., placed loose in each book. A pledge card or slip might be included. More than one social hour could be well employed in making these pleasure givers. As each will be different from all others, they can be passed from one to another in hospitals or camps and their sphere of influence thus widened.

These American Maid Scrap Books can be obtained, at 15 cents each, or $1.50 per dozen, of the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois.

Y. P. B. News Notes

The Italian Y. P. B. of the North End, Boston, Mass., has organized a flying squadron to aid in arousing public sentiment for prohibition.

The Jubilee Y. P. B. of Baltimore, Maryland, is privileged to have Mrs. D. T. Bourdeau, the revered and loved mother of the National W. C. T. U., superintendent of Health, one of its members. It celebrated Mothers' Day in helping "Mother" Bourdeau fittingly to observe her birthday.

Greetings to the "birthday lady" in the form of an original poem were read by a member of the Branch, and a year's subscription to The National Geographic Magazine presented to her. The Flower Mission superintendent gave her a beautiful bouquet of blossoms.

"Thus, as we meet our tasks and difficulties, our spirits crave a source of reinspiration and refreshment. That source is God, the vision of God, the remembrance of God."

HARMONIZATION POLICY IN SOLVING RACE PROBLEMS

The closing session of the conference was addressed by Prof. Julius Drachsler, assistant professor of sociology and economics in Smith College, on the subject of Racial Diversities and Social Problems. The race problem, Prof. Drachsler said, demands instant attention and will not permit drifting in the face of the growing difficulties at home and abroad. He discouraged philosophies of race domination and race antagonism as deterrents, rather than aids, in reaching a solution of the problem.

ENDORSE PROHIBITION ACT

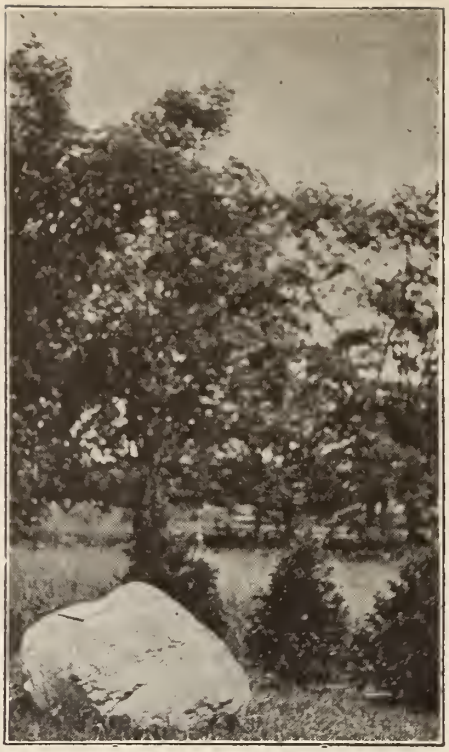
Mrs. Middleton Makes Tour of Summer Schools

Mrs. Elizabeth O. Middleton, national director of Scientific Temperance Instruction, has been making a tour of summer schools, and has received a most cordial reception. She spent two days at the Normal School at Bloomington, Illinois, speaking on two successive occasions to 2400 teachers at chapel, and holding conferences. At the DeKalb (Ill.) Normal School she appeared before a company of 700 or 800 teachers. At both places she found great interest in scientific temperance, and eagerness to learn of new methods of instruction. Literature on the subject was distributed. Mrs. Middleton is on her way to North Dakota where she is to give a series of talks in the schools, and from there she goes, on invitation, to the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, Canada.



Trees Planted at Llewsac Lodge in Memory of Frances E. Willard and Lillian M. N. Stevens

Lella M. Sewall, National Superintendent Flower Mission and Relief Work

It was a glorious day at Bedford, Massachusetts, one of those warm, sunshiny days that frequently come in the New England springtime. The fresh green grass, the blue sky, the warm, clear atmosphere, all combined to make a beautiful background for the interesting exercises to be held in the open air at Llewsac Lodge. A group of white ribboners, with others, gathered there for a sublime purpose—that of planting two trees in memory of our much loved leaders in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—our two great presidents, Frances E. Willard and Lillian M. N. Stevens. The program was simple, given in God's free air—singing, a prayer and a few brief addresses.

The inscription on the plate, placed on a boulder between the two trees, reads: "These two trees were planted by the National W. C. T. U. Department of Flower Mission and Relief Work, May 2, 1922, in memory of Frances E. Willard and Lillian M. N. Stevens, Presidents of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union from 1879 to 1898 and 1898 to 1914, respectively."

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life.

MRS. LAURA A. WINSTON, of Greensboro, North Carolina. As a teacher missionary to Mexico, vice-president World's Sunday School convention held in Jerusalem in 1906, a gifted and versatile writer, editor and W. C. T. U. worker, Mrs. Winston was a woman respected, admired and loved throughout the state. She was the first secretary of the state organization, and represented North Carolina at the World's W. C. T. U. convention in Edinburgh in 1900. Having given herself in early life wholeheartedly to unselfish service for others, her influence was wide-spread, and the seventy-two years of her life were radiant with deeds well done.

A large attendance marked the forty-second annual convention of the Orleans county (Vermont) W. C. T. U., held recently in the Congregational Church at Derby Line. A splendid atmosphere of cordiality and enthusiasm characterized the occasion; each number on the program was inspiring and educational.

The meeting was addressed by several prominent workers, and the musical selections were of a high order and excellently rendered.

The chairman was Mrs. M. L. Pearson county president, and also ex-state president; Mrs. Elsie Pease Barney, the present state president, occupied a seat of honor.

Mrs. Barney spoke of the campaign now on to win a million members the urgent need of redoubled effort to offset the wet propaganda, and the activities of the societies especially organized against the Eighteenth Amendment. We must educate ourselves to detect in our public press wet statements and be able to refute these intelligently.

There are eight unions in Orleans county, with a membership of 263. From all points the convention was a success and very worth while.

Americanization From the Foreigner's Viewpoint

Under the heading, "From Alien to Citizen," an editorial in Koti (Duluth, Minnesota), gives some very suggestive ideas on the duties of Americans toward the foreign-born in their midst:

"Constructive participation in the life of America is of the utmost importance. In the advancement from alien to citizen each individual should be made to feel that he can enter effectively into America's well-being and upbuilding," says the editor. "Ditch digging and road building are as necessary as law making or draft writing.

"Thoughtful Americans would try more earnestly to live up to their ideals of good citizenship and would come in closer contact with the foreigner, were they to realize that the alert would-be American is imitating them: that he is as clay in their hands to mould into their image, and to bear the marks of their characteristics.

"The strained relations between the foreigner and the native born, due to the foreigner having been neglected and isolated, and left strictly alone to work out his own salvation, must be lessened for the good of all concerned. This cannot be brought about by the elimination of the foreign press, or a suppression of the languages, or by the enactment of compulsory citizenship laws, for these measures would be autocratic. Preconceived prejudices must be laid aside and the foreigner treated like a human being. Too often he is exploited by unscrupulous grafters, and it hurts to be classed as greenhorns, dagoes, sheenies, and hunks."

Steuben Society Against Race Hatred

The John von Kalb Unit of the Steuben Society of Paterson, N. J., at a recent meeting, adopted resolutions aimed against race hatred and demanding that insulting sobriquets in the press, in speeches, and in the theatre be avoided. The resolution read as follows:

"Whereas the United States is at peace with all nations, and

"Whereas it should be the duty, desire and aim of all loyal citizens to strive for real equality among all citizens regardless of descent, color or religion, be it

"Resolved that we, the members of the John von Kalb Unit of the Steuben Society, assembled in regular session, do protest against the use of any expression which is intended or has the purpose to ridicule or belittle anyone because of his birth, descent, color or religion, in public speeches, or in the press, in the moving pictures or on the stage. In this connection we protest against the use of such terms of abuse as 'Chink', 'Chippey', 'Coon', 'Dago', 'Dutchman', 'Frogeater', 'Guinea', 'Greaser', 'Harp', 'Heinie', 'Kike', 'Limey', 'Mik', 'Nigger', 'Sparrow', 'Sheeney', 'Wop', and similar expressions which tend to arouse dissatisfaction and ill will towards the United States in the individuals and classes who are thereby made ridiculous." New York Staats Zeitung (German) New York City.

What an Immigrant Needs Most

The Jugoslav paper, Hrvatski Glasnik of Chicago, gives to its immigrant readers a catechism of the four main requisites for the immigrant. We quote the first question and answer:

"Which is the first main requisite for the immigrant?

"Health.

"Without health your life is ruined. Better for you never to have been born than to find yourself in a far off foreign country without health. Therefore, your first requisite is to preserve your health. Keep away from poisonous drinks—so you may not get into distress. What you save on drinks, spend—even half of that will be enough—on cleanliness. Cleanliness of your dwelling, body, bed. Cleanliness preserves your health, your greatest requisite. Every cent spent for the preservation of health is worth to you—a dollar, one hundred dollars! Of what avail is your country to you, politics, party, religion, systems—if you have no health?"

The other three requisites of the immigrant named are: A fraternal society, education, and thrift. The editor concludes:

"When you have taken care of satisfying these four requisites then you can say: I am a man, I am a citizen. Only then you can make yourself a good citizen. Only then can you become a worthy part of the nation with which you have linked your fate, a worthy and conscious member of your party. But if you do not care to build up your life upon these foundations, you are of no value to yourself or the nation."

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepdaughter come for a visit, and she learns that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb, wounded, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. A summons from Angela interrupts them. The doctor finds Angela ill and depressed, and at her request asks Fortescue to help his wife to resist her craving for liquor. Instead, he dismisses the doctor, and sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle, where she is easily led to take, first an alcoholized "medicine," and then the liquors offered by friends. Returning to Seraneb, she continues to drink, and wanders to Harford's bungalow one evening, after being turned out of the club, thus becoming a subject for gossip which her husband hears. He upbraids her, and she pours out her soul to Dr. Scott, who takes her to her hospital for treatment. Meanwhile, the friendship between Harford and Kathleen grows stronger. She accepts an invitation for a motor-car ride with him and while resting in the garden of a Mohammedan tomb, he tells her of his love.)

CHAPTER XXIV.

She could not answer. Then he knelt down by her side, and taking her hands, said, "Don't speak until I tell you something you ought to know; if when you have heard, you will take me, I am yours utterly and forever!"

She left her hands in his, and whispered, "Need you say it now?"

"Yes, I must; it is about my parentage; you must not be in the dark." His voice faltered. "It may decide you against me."

She smiled. "It cannot be very terrible; I have faith in you."

"Don't talk like that, dear heart, or I cannot tell you the story." He drew a long breath. "It is so hard! I am the son of inebriate parents!"

She started and released her hands.

"Don't shrink from me!" he cried.

"No! no! I did not shrink; go on;" she sat trembling.

"My father and my mother both died before middle age from intemperance. I vowed at my mother's death-bed that I would never touch alcohol, and never marry any one but an abstainer; and since I have known you, your goodness and purity have made me realize that a man with a taint in his blood is not fit for you. I love you with my whole heart, soul and strength; you fulfil all my desires—but—I ought not to have spoken—oh God, it is too much—to expect you to marry a man with my inheritance!"

"Mr. Harford, I had not the least idea of this, but wait—I love you!"

He clasped her in his arms; her look, her touch, the exquisite nearness, overcame him.

"And you will marry me?"

"Ah! that does not follow! You must let me think it over. No, don't look at me like that!"

He had let her go, and raised himself with a deep sob, almost like a grieving child.

She could not grasp yet any line of action. Her medical knowledge rose up to warn her against an alliance with one who inherited the drink curse. The stern code of heredity clamored to her of the nemesis of broken laws, while her woman's heart longed for the satisfaction of her love. In vain she tried to think steadily. Her love cried "Take him;" her reason, "Wait!"

"I honor you for trusting me with your secret," she said, holding out her hand. "You might have easily hidden it from me. You are so stalwart and healthy, no one could have even guessed."

He clasped her outstretched hand, and a bright light broke over his face.

"But," she said, interrupting his exclamation, "you must give me time to think it over. You do not fear any outbreak in yourself of this heredity?"

She hated herself the next moment for the inflection of voice which made her words seem a question. With swift intuition, he divined the subtle doubt in her speech. He felt, however, that it was not unreasonable. He met her look fully and frankly, but gravely.

"I have little cause for fear on that score, but I would not hand on to others an inheritance like mine!"

"I am sure you have," she replied warmly, "but it is not certain that you would."

He started up with gladness in his eyes. With the encouraging words, the spectre of his apprehension faded somewhat. "Will you, with your medical knowledge, make fresh inquiries as to the latest verdict of science? Kathleen, my love! my love! there may be hope!"

She put out her hand protestingly. "No! no! please not yet. I must have time—you will respect my wishes."

"Forgive me," he said, submissively.

"I have nothing to forgive. Let us go now."

They rose and went. In silence they dashed through the stillness of the Indian afterglow. Neither ever forgot the motor-ride! The sky seemed to be a conflagration at the edge of the world, and purple and gold and crimson flames above. What a fantastic ride it seemed! No other mode of travel gives one the sense of the unreality of objects! Avenues of trees opened out and were gone again! Single trees, like ghosts in the twilight raced past; no sound but the whirl of the machine in which they were darting through the night, broke the stillness. They had a sense of parting with everything, and being alone together in shifting space! Their hearts beat in unison, their eyes rested on each other. Each was to the other the sole thought of each mind!

Too soon it was over. As the car drew up at the door of the hospital, Harford drew out his watch and showed it to Kathleen. "I have kept my promise, two hours only! but what an infinity of bliss and pain!" He leaned towards her.

"Don't keep me long in doubt. I cannot bear it!"

A deep look of love and trust from Kathleen's eyes sent him away happy, in spite of the cloud of uncertainty which enveloped him.

Angela was Kathleen's first thought. She devoted herself for the next hour to describing the ride, and to looking after her comforts for the night, all the while with beating heart, longing to be alone.

At last, the dinner over, and Angela and the rest of her patients settled for the night, she sat down to think.

Yes, she loved him; never before had she seen a face or touched a hand so dear as his; her heart revelled in his declaration of love; a wild joy filled her at the memory of the look in his eyes. But dare she risk marriage with him? Dare she, enlightened as she was by years of medical study, help to hand on to another human being a stained heredity? Her mind was in a turmoil. She pictured despairingly the black future without him. But father and mother both drunkards!

"What is my duty? Oh, God, help me to decide!" She fell on her knees. The answer came—Duty. Yes, duty, not her own satisfaction. Now to find out what her duty was!

She spent half the night in study of her medical books on the subject. Her face darkened, and her heart sank as she read, "Not one of the transmitted wrongs, physical or mental, is more certainly passed on to those yet unborn, than the wrongs which are inflicted by alcohol." This was the verdict of a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of Great Britain.

She went to bed, sad and discouraged. A few hours' sleep and she was up again. A bright thought darted into her mind as she awoke, "He is not an inebriate, he has never touched alcohol; he is a life-long abstainer, his brain and nervous system have not been deteriorated!"

Hope, the befriending, stepped in to work for the happiness of these lovers! "I will write to Professor Crothers of Hartford, Connecticut; he has published a book on 'Marriage and Inebriety.' I will lay my case before him and abide by his advice." And that day the letter was mailed.

About noon the next day Kathleen heard, to her surprise, Harold's voice from her veranda asking if she were able to see him.

The hot blood mounted to her face, quickened with the surprise—the joy of seeing him. He came into the half-darkened room with eager haste.

"Dr. Scott—'Kathleen,' may I say?"

She smiled and nodded and held out her hand.

He clasped and kissed it; looking into her eyes, he saw that which made him laugh with delight, and draw her close.

"This will never do!" said Kathleen, extricating herself from his close embrace. "Remember our problem. You must really wait until that is solved."

"Have you any light on it?"

"A ray came to me this morning."

"A ray of hope?"

"Yes."

"Ah! my dearest! don't deceive or mislead me; it would be the death of me!"

"Can you wait two months?"

"Two months! what an eternity!"

"Yes, I am writing to consult Dr. Crothers, a great authority on inebriety in America. I can get no answer for at least eight weeks."

A big sigh broke from Harford; then suddenly his face grew grave, and he drew a letter out of his pocket. "Look here! I really came to tell you some serious tidings, but forgot it, for the moment, in the joy of your sweet presence. I had this from Colonel Green. He was summoned two days ago, by special messenger, to go out to Fortescue in camp at Mogalia. He has been exceedingly ill. Colonel Green writes that it is a serious case, complications have arisen. He proposes to take Fortescue to the Ramsay hospital at Naini Tal, and thinks Mrs. Fortescue and the child should go at once to be with him."

"This is indeed grave news! Poor Angela! Do you think she should go? It is a great risk, though she is much better."

"I think she must decide for herself. Green asks me to conduct her to Bareilly, and there meet him and the sick man!"

Angela heard the news of her husband's illness with much distress. They did not tell her there was danger, for Kathleen judged it wiser to keep that from her.

"Oh, poor Frank!" Her heart turned to her husband in his trouble. "I must go and nurse him!"

And so it was decided. At the evening train, Harford with his charge, which included Angela, the baby, and Ayah and Divan Singh, who had come to ask if he might be allowed to go with the Mem Sahiba, were seen off by Kathleen. He left them at Bareilly, after the train which brought the invalid and Colonel Green arrived.

He carried word to Kathleen, the next evening, that the sick man was in a very weak state, and that Col. Green had shaken his head and mumbled something about "strong drink and liver," but in the hurry he had been unable to get at any clear conception of the malady.

"I feel intensely anxious about Angela. She has been with me a month, and there is a great improvement in her condition, but any outbreak or sudden shock would prove very serious," said Kathleen.

"Divan Singh will look after her. I gave him a packet of addressed postcards and he has promised to send word to you if anything goes wrong."

"How thoughtful of you!"

"And don't overwork yourself, my dearest, this hot weather! How I wish I had the right to take you to the hills. Ah! God grant I may have that joy before very long!"

"It would be happiness to be in your care." Kathleen dismissed him with these words. She had little leisure; hot though it was, patients could not wait even for their Miss Doctor Sahiba to entertain her lover.

From An Honorary Member

I wish to thank you for the great work that you and your organizations and publications are doing. I count it no small privilege that I can be one of the honorary members of the Fort Worth W. C. T. U. As such I am receiving regularly THE UNION SIGNAL. I find it both interesting and profitable reading. But best of all I am placing it on our reading room table where the young people of the church will have access to it.

Miss Fanny Armstrong is a very dear personal friend of mine and I see her quite often. She is ever thinking of the advancement of the cause of temperance and the W. C. T. U. If your movement had done nothing else than to give to the world a few choice spirits like "Aunt Fannie" it would be well worth the effort that you put into it.

Again thanking you, and wishing you God's blessing in your great work for humanity, I am

Yours very truly,

Specialists on Relation of Insanity to Alcohol

Dr. W. A. Evans, writing in The Chicago Tribune, tells us:

"The great authority on insanity, Bleuler, says alcoholism is on the increase in Switzerland since the government relaxed the wartime restrictions and began allowing the brewing of a stronger beer.

"He asserts that specialists in insanity should take the lead in the fight against alcohol, declaring that those who favor the use of alcoholic beverages in moderation must be prepared for a return of all the misery which goes with alcoholism.

"Dr. Peter Bassoe, in commenting on Bleuler's article in the Practical Medicine Series, says:

" 'It is only fair to state that, contrary to what one might expect, the psychiatrists of the German speaking countries, led by Forel of Switzerland and Kraepelin of Germany, have been the most active supporters of the campaign against alcoholism.'

"Kraepelin, Forel and Bleuler are great names among the German speaking people. If their advice is listened to, there should be lower death rates from some of the diseases which are commonly called degenerative."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

HEARING ON QUESTION OF SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON AMERICAN SHIPS ON HIGH SEAS—BRIEFS FILED BY NATIONAL W. C. T. U. AND ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE—NATIONAL PRESIDENT A VISITOR AT LEGISLATIVE HEADQUARTERS IN WASHINGTON

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

The prohibition happening of the week in Washington was a hearing before the Attorney-General at the Department of Justice on the question of the sale of intoxicating liquors on American ships on the high seas and the possession of liquor on foreign ships within the three-mile limit. The hearing was held and concluded on Thursday afternoon. Mrs. Mabel Willebrandt, Assistant Attorney-General and in charge of prohibition cases, sat with Attorney-General Daugherty at the hearing, as did an assistant, Colonel Guy D. Goff.

The hearing was conducted in a dignified manner, with attorneys presenting conflicting views, as they would in a court room. The public was not admitted, but representatives of several organizations that had briefs prepared by legal advisers, and who had several days previously given notice, were permitted to be present and file such briefs. On behalf of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, our national president, Miss Gordon, filed a brief signed by Catharine Waugh McCulloch, legal counsel for the national organization.

Mr. Ira Campbell, counsel for the American Steamship Owners' Association, opened the legal battle. Mr. Campbell contended that the Eighteenth Amendment was not self-executing, and the only enforceable legislation was provided by the Volstead Act, which failed to define the boundaries wherein it should apply, and as a consequence definition of the "territorial jurisdiction of the United States," as provided in the Eighteenth Amendment, must be obtained from other legal sources. The Revised Statutes, he argued, defined "the limits within which acts of Congress are operative" as organized territories. The high seas, he said, could not be construed under this statute as "organized territories of the United States."

Wayne B. Wheeler, attorney for the Anti-Saloon League, followed Mr. Campbell and most ably argued that:

THE TRANSPORTATION AND SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR FOR BEVERAGE PURPOSES ABOARD VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES ON THE HIGH SEAS IS UNLAWFUL UNDER THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE ACT OF CONGRESS KNOWN AS THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT ENACTED FOR ITS ENFORCEMENT.

THE POSSESSION OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR FOR BEVERAGE PURPOSES IS PROHIBITED ON ALL VESSELS WITHIN THE THREE-MILE LIMIT.

The right of a nation to exercise jurisdiction over vessels flying its flag on the high seas is well recognized in international law.

Mr. Wheeler urged that offenses under the Eighteenth Amendment are different from other offenses defined by Federal statutes because the offenses on the ships on the seas are created and defined by the Constitution itself.

He distinguished the cases referred to by the shipping interests on the theory that the Constitution did not define these offenses but simply authorized Congress to do so, and it was a question of the wording of the statute in each of these cases.

Congress did not grant to vessels of the United States Shipping Board any immunity from the penal laws of the United States.

That Congress intended to prohibit the sale of liquor on such vessels is conclusively shown by the fact that it has consistently refused to enact legislation authorizing it, though insistently besought to do so.

Mr. Wheeler also contended that the possession of beverage intoxicants on foreign ships as well as American ships within the three-mile limit is prohibited. The "transportation and possession of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes" is specifically prohibited by the National Prohibition Act. There is no exception in the law. The Supreme Court has recently held that: "The Eighteenth Amendment meant a great revolution in the policy of this country. * * It did not confine itself in any meticulous way to the use of intoxicants in this country. That the transportation of beverage intoxicants through the country, which was granted formerly by statutes and by treaty provisions, no longer obtained since the Eighteenth Amendment had been adopted." As the court well said: "The Amendment meant to stop the whole business." It is not only good law but good policy for this government to construe and enforce this law so as to treat all vessels alike within the three-mile limit.

Judge John Britt, introduced by Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, made an argument for the United States Prohibition Unit.

Excerpts From Brief Filed by National Woman's Christian Temperance Union

Excerpts from the memorandum filed by our legal counsel, Mrs. McCulloch, are here given:

"On behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union this memorandum is filed in the hope that it may prove helpful in the correct solution of the question of the application of the Eighteenth Amendment and National Prohibition Act to vessels of the United States on the high seas and to all vessels within the three-mile limit of the United States.

"The question of whether the Constitution follows the flag has been much discussed and debated. In several decisions of the United States Supreme Court the issue has been incidentally involved. The present controversy raises the question squarely. The people of the United States have, by an amendment to their Constitution, added to that historic document a new principle after several decades of experimentation in an effort to reach a correct solution of the problems of government flowing from the evils attendant upon the licensed sale of intoxicants for beverage purposes. The Eighteenth Amendment so far as it pertains to this case is in the following language:

' * * * the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

"Analyzing the language employed two things are observed: First, it lays prohibition upon the manufacture, sale transportation, importation or exportation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes; second, it declares the extent o its operation. The fact that the Amendment did not simply lay a prohibition an stop with that but that it went furthe and in comprehensive terms defined th scope within which the prohibition wa to apply is indicative of an intentio upon the part of the people of the Unite States that there should be nothing lef to surmise or implication as to the ex tent of its operation.

"The Supreme Court in its decision i the case of Rhode Island vs. Palmer, 25 U. S. 350, 64 L. Ed. 946, in which it up held the validity of the Amendment an the constitutionality of the National Pro hibition Act enacted for its enforcement said:

> 'The first section of the Amendment—the one embodying the prohibition—is operative throughout the entire territorial limits of the United States, binds all legislative bodies, courts, public officers, and individuals within those limits, and of its own forces invalidates every legislative act—whether by Congress, by a state legislature, or by a territorial assembly—which authorizes or sanctions what the section prohibits.'

"It will be observed that the cou uses the words 'is operative throughou the entire territorial limits of the Unite States.' These are not words of lim tation. If the court had intended to us restrictive language in connection wit the interpretations of this language i the Amendment it would have used th phrase 'actual territorial limits.' Th phrase 'actual territorial limits' is on which is well understood in internation law when the purpose is to refer to th actual confines of a country and the thre mile limit over which jurisdiction commonly exercised as a matter sovereign right under international la

National President Spends Week Legislative Headquarters

Our national president, Miss Gordo is always joyously welcomed at the Le islative Headquarters in Washingto Her visit during the past week has mad possible conferences with Congression and government officials relative to pr hibition and our work in general, an these "powers that be" have as a resu been impressed anew with the inspirin influence and strength of the Woman Christian Temperance Union.

Illinois Catholics Adopt Resolutions Against Liquor on Ships

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union, of Illinois, at its fifty-third convention held recently in Chicago, adopted unanimous resolutions condemning the sale of liquor on board American ships.

The resolutions, a copy of which, according to the Chicago Tribune, was forwarded to President Harding, follow:

"The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of Illinois is unalterably opposed to the sale of intoxicating liquor on American ships, whether anchored in American ports or sailing on the high seas thousands of miles from American land.

"We believe the American flag, now the glorious emblem of sobriety and righteousness throughout the civilized world, should not be polluted nor degraded because certain interests see an imaginary mercenary advantage in suggesting to the United States shipping board the fallacious argument that it is necessary to sell intoxicating liquors on American ships in order to compete successfully with ships flying foreign flags.

"We deny that the great majority of American business men and American travelers would fail to patronize American ships flying their own beloved Stars and Stripes simply because they carried on board no intoxicating liquors in compliance with the laws of their native land."

Montreal Methodists Against Government Control of Intoxicating Beverages

In its annual conference, the other week, the Methodist ministers of Montreal by strong resolutions expressed their unqualified disapproval of the Quebec government's liquor policy, urging that all churches unite in an eductional campaign, and requesting the Quebec Legislature at its next session to amend the present law to refuse all permits to sell alcoholic beverages unless the application is accompanied by signatures of a majority of the electors residing in the polling district in which the sales are to take place.

Because of Prohibition

"Brewers are now doing less than one-fourth the business they did before prohibition," said Thomas Keeley, president of the Keeley Brewing company, at a meeting of members of the recently disbanded Chicago Brewers' Protective Association, held in Chicago, as quoted by the Chicago Evening Post. "Prohibition is responsible, of course, for this sad state of affairs," he continued. "Business is very bad, and at present there doesn't seem to be much chance of its improving."

Methodist Bishops Issue Statement on Prohibition and Law Enforcement

At the regular meeting of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, held this year in Indianapolis, Indiana, a statement was adopted which contains the following reference to the Volstead Act and the Eighteenth Amendment:

"Obedience to law is not an elective to be rendered or refused on the basis of individual or group choice. This we believe. But it is inconsistent to inveigh against the spirit of lawlessness in other fields if in our attitude towards the prohibitory enactment we encourage contempt of law. Those who make public opinion must be held accountable for the total result when inconsiderate criticism of laws induces insult to laws. The press of this country must be made to see its responsibility inescapable if its persistent caricature of so called temperance laws leads the immature to believe that the law itself belongs really and only in the comic supplement.

"Where present legislation seems inadequate let it be perfected. Where the law is ineffectual, find the cause and as quickly as may be, remedy it. Let us insist upon it that those who are sworn to uphold the Constitution deal with occasion not as propagandists of personal judgment but as defenders of the law.

"Let us choose for office those only who have by word or act established their right to recognition as the friends of prohibitory reform."

Ex-Secretary Daniels Attacks Liquor Sale on U. S. Ships

Mr. Josephus Daniels, former Secretary of the Navy, known as the "man who made the navy dry," is said to have characterized the sale of liquors on United States vessels as "scandalous" in a Chautauqua address at Walhawla, N. D. "Any man who had studied law for fifteen minutes would know that the present laws could not be interpreted to permit the sale of liquors on ships and prohibit the sale on land," he declared. He expressed his belief that nothing short of a special act of Congress could make the sale of liquor on United States ships permissible.

A Cabinet Member Sadly Out of Tune With the Country

(Senator Arthur Capper, in Capper's Weekly).

If this country's capability of expressing its feelings had not been so severely overtaxed in recent years, I think the extraordinary speech recently of a member of the cabinet to the graduating class of an Ohio university, would have put its power of expressing astonishment to the test.

It was a singular time and place and occasion for a high official of the government to attack popular government generally, and the direct primary and the prohibition law, in particular.

In his most remarkable and ill-advised speech to these students, Secretary Weeks, it seems to me, outbolsheviked the Bolsheviks in declaring popular government a failure.

Such a public address by a public official in times like these cannot but be taken seriously, and however mistaken and extreme the views expressed, they must have the effect somewhat of shaking the faith of many people in our institutions.

If a member of the President's cabinet holds the views Secretary Weeks says he holds, whether as a private citizen or public official, he should resign immediately as an official of this government, for he has shown himself to be so wholly out of sympathy with what he has sworn as an official to maintain and uphold, that he is in no frame of mind to uphold it, and neither in spirit nor in fact is he upholding and fulfilling the obligations of his official oath.

Mr. Weeks is an anachronism. He should resign and let some broader-visioned, more courageous man in touch with the times, take his place.

U. S. Senators Lenroot and Frelinghuysen Plead for Law Observance

"Disregard for the law is the greatest problem that America now faces, constituting a menace which, if unchecked, spells anarchy and ruin," United States Senator Lenroot, of Wisconsin, declared in an address made at the Ocean Grove (New Jersey) Independence Day celebration.

Senator Lenroot urged observance of the Volstead law and deplored the tendency of the people to split into groups.

Senator Frelinghuysen of New Jersey presided at the celebration and also made a patriotic address.

Warning against un-American doctrines and propaganda was given by Senator Frelinghuysen.

"These dangerous doctrines," he declared, "proclaimed in high places, show disregard for law and a weakening of the national spirit which made us a great nation."

Senator Frelinghuysen also declared for law enforcement, and added:

"There is a tendency among certain prominent officials to preach disregard for the law, under the camouflage of 'modification,' which means nothing less than nullification of the Constitution."

Elks Pledged to Support Dry Laws

Declaring that it is the duty of every Elk to stand for law and order, Grand Exalted Ruler William Wallace Mountain, in a stirring address at the opening session of the annual grand lodge reunion, held recently in Atlantic City, pledged the great benevolent organization to obedience to the Volstead and all other laws, and called on Elkdom for the best it can produce to aid civic betterment and help the nation fit its boys for American citizenship.

Prohibition Instrumental In Bringing Prosperity

Mr. Walter Grundy, president of the Fourth State Bank of Hutchinson, Kansas, on returning from a recent trip to New York City, reported business in the east to be flourishing, with a big building boom on, and everywhere evidences of a financial well-being such as has not been experienced since the war.

"Money is easy, as a result of the big money reserves," said Mr. Grundy, as quoted by the Hutchinson News. "Prohibition is being given much credit for this condition. The millions of dollars that formerly went for booze are now going into legitimate channels, and this is having a great deal to do with restoration of prosperity."

Congresswoman Robertson Opens Campaign for Re-election

Standing on the site where the first missionary school in the old Indian country was established and where her mother, a teacher in that school, met her father, Miss Alice Robertson, Oklahoma Congresswoman, on July Fourth opened her campaign for the Republican renomination to succeed herself.

Miss Robertson said her only platform was that she was "a Christian, an American and a Republican." She opened her address with a scriptural passage which she read from a large Bible.

A WOMAN CITIZEN'S RELATION TO THE LAW

Mrs. Edward Franklin White, Chairman Legislation, Federation Women's Clubs

(From Address Delivered before Biennial Convention National Federation Women's Clubs, Chautauqua, New York)

Because the enforcement of all laws is hampered by the weak-kneed, spineless enforcement of the prohibition laws, I want to speak particularly of the enforcement of the Eighteenth or Prohibition Amendment to the Federal Constitution and the Federal and state acts enacted for its enforcement, or for the enforcement of state prohibitory laws. Not because these are the only laws which are being violated, for that is not true. It may be that these prohibition laws are among the so-called "Blue Laws." Any law looks blue to the man who wants to violate it; and all that any criminal asks is to be let alone.

I believe that prohibition as a political issue is a thing of the past, just as slavery is a thing of the past. But I also believe that public sentiment should be stabilized, and leadership strengthened.

Positive, Aggressive Work is Necessary

At a moment when the forces against prohibition are doing everything in their power to create public sentiment in favor of the restoration of beer and wine in order to weaken the effectiveness of prohibition, the temperance forces ought to be doing positive, aggressive work in teaching the public the danger in such relaxation. It will be observed that the anti-prohibition forces do not undertake to face squarely the issue whether beer, for instance, is a harmless drink. They are now playing on various prejudices and uncertainties, claiming failure of prohibition, the difficulty of enforcement, the infringement of personal liberty, etc. The temperance forces ought to bring out the real issue emphatically, and by a campaign of education show the actual danger in allowing the laws to be weakened by admitting the sale of beer and wine. When one understands the fundamental facts he will not be swept away by superficial arguments.

Our country has, through that powerful thing we call majority rule, adopted the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution. We in this country believe in majority rule. We have discarded kings because we believe in majority rule. No amendment can be adopted without a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, and ratification by three-fourths of all the states. That means a good substantial majority. When the Eighteenth Amendment was thus adopted and incorporated into the Constitution, it became a part of that great document which guarantees our civil and political rights and privileges and which secures for us liberty and freedom, personal and religious. It becomes, then, our duty to support it. We owe much of our power and influence to the Nineteenth Amendment—let us give our unqualified support to the Eighteenth Amendment. American will power is the alchemy that has turned apparent impossibilities into startling achievements.

Eighteenth Amendment a Legitimate Outgrowth of Education

We sometimes hear it said that the Eighteenth Amendment was slipped over while the world wasn't looking and while the soldier boys were away. We know better than that. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been working and praying for its adoption for more than forty years. The Prohibition party had that for its chief objective for years. The Anti-Saloon League for many years has been doing a very practical work in attaining that end. The majority of the states were dry by their own acts before the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted. The dry states elected a dry Congress which registered a two-thirds vote for the amendment, and when it was referred back to the states for ratification, more than three-fourths of the states ratified it—in fact, at this time, all but two of the states have ratified. That's how it was "slipped over." It has now become a part of our ancient and honored Constitution, by legitimate growth.

Again, I quote from Chief Justice Taft that "One who, in the matter of national prohibition, holds his personal opinion and his claim of personal liberty to be of higher sanction than this overwhelming constitutional expression of the people, is a disciple of practical bolshevism."

There are five elements in the enforcement of the prohibition law—the prosecuting attorneys, judges, juries, prohibition enforcement officers, and public opinion.

Public opinion keeps all the other elements on the job. But public opinion must not stand mute, it must not be anonymous—it must be fearless. It must support every officer—it must stand shoulder to shoulder with all the agencies of law enforcement.

Each element or branch of law enforcement has its part to play—but they are all interdependent. The prosecuting attorney is the chief local officer, because with him rests the initiative of bringing offenders before the court. But before he prosecutes, some one must file an affidavit charging the offender with a violation of the law, and this affidavit may be filed as well by a private citizen as by a peace officer.

Anyone who has the information may file the affidavit. Sometimes a prosecuting attorney may be anxious and willing to prosecute but is blocked by an indifferent judge. Sometimes, it is the other way around. There is where public opinion may step in and be the deciding factor. If it demands prosecutions and enforcement, these will follow,

They are emotional and sentimental sympathetic or severe, according as the attorney for the defense or the prosecution makes the strongest appeal. But they, too, respond to public pressure—really reflect public opinion quite as much as the others mentioned. If two or more good women would sit in court every time a liquor violation case is tried we should soon see a great difference in the number of convictions.

The enforcement officers embrace all peace officers, in addition to the Federal prohibition enforcement officers—from the attorney general of the state down to every policeman of a city, constable of a township, and marshal of a village.

Things the Ordinary Citizen May Do

Let me enumerate some of the possibilities, and even the duties, of the ordinary citizen who hasn't the remotest connection with any official position. First, he may help to stifle the wave of loose talk going over the country. He may discourage the joker, silence the talker, back down the braggart, and challenge the wise bird, who intimates that he knows so much, to take his evidence to the prosecuting attorney. He may secure evidence and present it to the proper officer. He may employ counsel under the prohibition act, to assist in the prosecution of cases. He may institute proceedings, under the authority of the same law, to remove inefficient and in different officers.

He may institute proceedings to close clubs, and to abate a place where liquor is sold as a nuisance. This is a splendid opportunity for civic or law enforcing associations.

With this in mind, don't say "Why don't they enforce the law."

A reason urged for the repeal of the constitutional prohibition of the use of intoxicants is that the law is violated and its enforcement expensive. No one has urged the repeal of other criminal laws for this reason. It has not been the case with the older crimes and is not urged with reference to the newer crimes. A new crime is the theft of automobiles. The laws against this crime are most stringent, yet the law is constantly violated and is enforced with great difficulty

Questions They Should Be Asked

The Spokane (Washington) Chronicle quotes one of the officials of the "Sanity League" as saying that while all the money needed for the promotion of the work of this organization could be gotten from the wine men and the brewers, it preferred to get it from the people themselves. Apropos of which remark the editor asks some very pertinent questions which all who desire the return of light wines and beer should propound to themselves:

"Who's to get the chief benefit of this scheme to cripple the Volstead law and 'bring back light wines and two and three-quarters per cent beer'? Who will pile up bank balances, buy limousines and build new palaces if congress can be bamboozled or bluffed into setting the Constitution aside on the transparent plea that light wine and beer do not make men drunk?

"Not the men who are to spend their money for the beer and wine. Not the fellows whose brains are to be muddled and wills weakened by drink. Not the wife nor the children of the fool who is to stagger home filled with the 'harmless' stuff sold to him 'under government supervision? Not the girl or boy who is to find honesty, conscience, self-respect, decency, growing weaker, as the old appetite for alcohol tightens its hold, as it tightened its hold on hundreds of thousands of fine young men and women in the old saloon days.

"Who will reap the harvest of dollars if 'light wines and beer' are to be peddled again in this nation? The brewers; the wine manufacturers; the wholesalers; the drink sellers; the kings of the dives and dens of the underworld, who hate the Volstead law with all their gangrened hearts and would gladly throw heavy purses into a fund that gave promise of bringing in a new era of vice and shame and debauchery and crime."

PROHIBITION HAS MADE GOOD!

Woods Hutchinson, M. D., in Hearst's Magazine for July

One statement can now be made with bsolute sureness, and that is that all ver the country there has occurred a ost unmistakable and striking decline n the general death rate from all causes, ntil it has now reached its most tri- mphant low-water mark in all recorded istory.

Just as a single illustration to serve as type of all the rest, the death rate for he entire United States has fallen in he last three years from 14.2 to 12.3 per housand, or a saving of over 200,000 lives er year. Certain of our great cities, ew York, for instance, have actually, in ome of their monthly rates, fallen below welve and gone down well towards leven per thousand.

It is true that this downward trend of he death rate was under way before rohibition, and, therefore, we cannot laim that the improvement in public ealth, which has accompanied the years f drought, has been solely or even hiefly caused by the lessened use of alcohol. Yet it is also true that this downward trend of the death rate has been distinctly accelerated since the adoption of prohibition.

So that as far as any lowering of the vigor and vitality of the nation from deprivation of our customary daily glass of wine and beer is concerned, we can bluntly and positively say that the three years have not yielded one shred of evidence in its support.

For example, the disease which has shown the greatest falling off in its mortality, is tuberculosis—a disease, the chief and almost only weapon against which is abundance of good food, good housing and sleep in the open air. Saving the money which had been worse than wasted on alcohol and applying it to the four or five times as much health and nutritive value which it would purchase in the form of good food, better housing and clothing and sleeping porches, to say nothing of country and seaside vacations, and basket suppers in the parks, has already cut down the death rate from this dread malady nearly twenty per cent and saved the nation tens of thousands of lives.

Almost unanimous reports from public school teachers, school and district nurses, welfare workers among the poor, intelligent police chiefs and heads of charitable organizations, show that never, in all their experience, has there been so striking an improvement in the feeding, the clothing, the general comfort and welfare of school children as within the last two years.

Children are making better progress in their studies, not only because they are better clothed and fed, but because they come to school less tired and exhausted by the various kind of wage-earning jobs and errands, which they are no longer obliged to undertake now that fathers turn over four-fifths of their wages to the mothers instead of drinking up half or even two-thirds of them in the saloons.

POPULARITY OF PROHIBITION GROWING IN NEBRASKA

Bank President Finds Benefits of Prohibition Law Immeasurable

R. M. Hampton, President The First National Bank, Alliance, Neb.

Referring to the questionnaire sent ut by the National W. C. T. U., investiating the conditions resulting from the doption of the prohibition law, and nswering the question, directed more articularly to the viewpoint of banking nstitutions as they see the results of the ry law, I would say that before its adopion our local community for a time arred saloons from the city, and during hat period we had a number of people pen accounts with our bank, and at the ame time keep reasonable commercial ccounts, whose families, prior to this ourse, had to be supported by charitable rganizations because of the money that as spent through the saloons. Since the ational law went into effect the benefits ave been still greater, and it would be ard for us to state the number of people vho have since that time saved their arnings, and have not only in certain nstances kept bank accounts, but have etter provided for their families, the noney going for necessary articles, thus enefiting the mercantile lines of our ity. It would be impossible for us to xpress in language the good that we ave found coming from the adoption of he prohibitory law.

City Jail Empty Most of Time

N. A. Kemmish, City Manager, Alliance, Neb.

The Nineteenth Amendment to our onstitution gave women the right to ote. The Eighteenth Amendment will ever be repealed by the women's vote. f it is ever repealed, it will be because he women fail in their privilege and duty o vote.

Our city jail is now empty most of the ime. For the year ending May, 1917, our olice records show 451 arrests emanating from liquor causes. Our records how 70 arrests for all other causes dur- ng this period, making a total of 521 rrests for the year ending May 1, 1917. During that time only those men were rrested who were making such disturbnces that the police were obliged to ake them into custody. During the past year, however, the police have constantly and diligently been on the search for bootleggers and drunks and law violators, and have arrested them wherever found, whether they were disturbing anyone or not. Our police records show for the year ending May 1, 1922, 33 arrests emanating from liquor causes and 34 from other causes, making a total of 67 arrests during this period. These figures were taken from our police records and need no comment.

Our city, county and other officers are working together as one unit. Our city and county courts are working in perfect harmony in seeing that the laws of our city and state are being enforced. So far as the law enforcing body in Box Butte County is concerned, they are all working in perfect harmony. However, the weak link in our chain is in our district court when it comes to enforcing the prohibition law in this end of the state. It is high time, if we are to have equal law enforcement over the entire state, that we see to it that the men in charge of our courts are in sympathy with the enforcement of our statutory laws. Especially is this true in the higher courts of appeal. The higher the court, the more importance this holds.

Certain Crimes Show Marked Decrease

Lee Basye, County Attorney, Box Butte County, Neb.

I have been county attorney of Box Butte County, Nebraska, for about seven and one-half years. During the first part of my administration we were operating under the licensed saloon and during the last part we have been under the prohibitory act, and from my experience I find that the community has been more progressive and law abiding than when liquor was to be had.

It is true that there has been a large number of cases brought for the prosecution of violators of the prohibitory law but on the other hand there has been less burglary, larceny and other crimes committed.

There is also a remarkable improvement in the matter of the poor since the licensed saloon has been abolished and several parties who formerly spent all of their money there, now refuse to drink this moonshine liquor that can be found in certain communities, and are supporting their families.

I consider prohibition to be one of the most progressive steps this country has ever taken and will in time, I believe, be considered as important as the abolishment of slavery.

Vast Improvement in Citizenship

T. C. Munger, U. S. District Judge, Lincoln, Neb.

The liquor traffic is a useless waste of money and time, and causes crime and poverty. Prohibition brings a vast improvement in industry and good citizenship. There is not now one-hundredth part as much drunkenness. The general class of people, young or old, accept prohibition willingly. It is mere bravado or wilfulness in those who do not, and time will soon make all willing to be abstainers.

No Case in Three Years of Neglected and Dependent Children

Ira E. Tash, County Judge, Butte County, Nebraska

Our county jail is now empty. Practically the only inmates during the last year have been sent there for violations of the prohibition law.

We have had no cases of dependent and neglected children in Juvenile court traceable to excessive use of intoxicating liquor on the part of parents, for more than three years.

Prohibition's Popularity Growing in Nebraska, Says Judge in Manufacturer's Record

William T. Thompson, Ex-Attorney General of Nebraska

My experience or observation convinces me that prohibition has been of great benefit to labor, and instead of throwing much of the wages into the sewer it has placed them on the backs of children and wives for their happiness and comfort.

We carried Nebraska in 1916 for Constitutional Prohibition by about 30,000. My judgment is that if voted on today it would carry by 120,000 or more.

MRS. LIVINGSTON'S TOUR OF SOUTH AFRICA

RECEIVES OVATIONS FROM OFFICIALS, EDUCATORS AND TEMPERANCE WORKERS

Glowing accouuts of the success of the meetings addressed by Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, represeutative of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in South Africa, are being received from our comrades there. Officials, educators and temperance workers are extravagant in praise of her eloquent and convincing messages.

Miss Emilie J. Solomon, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of South Africa, writes of her cordial reception by the public at the various points visited.

From Cape Town, she went to Mossel Bay and from there to Oudtshoorn. At both places she spoke to audiences that filled the largest hall available. She also addressed the students at the training college and met the ladies of the town informally at tea.

We quote from a report from Port Elizabeth, the next point visited: "Mrs. Livingston twice filled to overflowing the town hall; she preached twice on Sunday, was the guest at a W. C. T. U. and W. E. L. reception, with five hundred present, where she delivered a stirring address on woman suffrage. In the evening of the same day, she spoke to a large meeting of colored people, and the following day to a company of young people.

At Uitenhage, at a large public meeting, she gave a talk to three hundred students from the training college and high schools. The principal thus expressed his appreciation: "This is something that we can expect to have only once in a lifetime."

At Grahamstown, she had a message for the students of the training college, was entertained at a tea, and spoke on suffrage in the town hall. Three services were arranged on Sunday. She gave a short address at Rhodes' University College, spoke at a young people's service, and to a large native and colored congregation. Other incidents of her stay were a public luncheon, with Sir George Correy in the chair, and a crowded public meeting in the evening.

While in Lovedale, she addressed a company of five hundred native students and spoke at the Fort Hare Interstate Native College.

Writing of the meetings at Kingwilliamstown, a W. C. T. U. worker says: "The town hall was filled last night at Mrs. Livingston's meeting. She was listened to with the rapt attention she deserves, and everyone seemed willing to be informed."

The visit to East London was reported as very successful socially. A morning tea, in the quadrangle of the town hall was a fashionable social function, the mayor and mayoress, and the deputy mayor being present. Mrs. Livingston s charmed her hearers that a large audience came to hear her in the evening "For over an hour," reads the report "Mrs. Livingston held the vast audienc spellbound, and for another half-hou answered questions."

Crowded churches at Durban greeted the W. C. T. U. representative from the United States. A reception presided over by the president of the National Council of Women, talks to students at the Girls College and the Boys' Technical School a meeting with a representative body o women and a mass meeting at the town hall, were among the interesting features of her stay.

The response to Mrs. Livingston's message is most enthusiastic. Everywhere is heard appreciation of her logical presentation of the prohibition situation in the United States. As one corresponden expresses it: "Mrs. Livingston told them the truth, and pricked the bubble of the evils from prohibition very effectually."

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION AND SANS-ALCOHOL RESTAURANTS PROMOTED BY WHITE RIBBONERS OF GERMANY

Gustel v. Blucher, President W. C. T. U. of Germany

The Deutsche Bund Abstinenter Frauen esteems it its principal task to win women of all social classes for total abstinence. To this end, leaflets and pamphlets are distributed at meetings, lectures, and classes, as well as sent out in large quantities by post.

Our union last year undertook as its special work the winning of clergymen's wives. A discourse delivered by the president to a circle of clergymen and their wives was printed in a widely circulated clerical paper, and later sent out in pamphlet form to many thousands of clerical officers and clergymen, or personally given out by our members.

Of late we have been devoting particular attention to young, expectant mothers, or those nursing a baby or having infants to bring up. The first impulse was given through the International Congress at Lausanne in 1921. We call this movement "Saat der Hoffnung" (Seed of Hope). A first-class artist presented us with a beautiful picture for a poster, showing a young mother with her baby, and bearing the inscription: "Mothers, never give alcohol to your children!" This poster is to be brought out in large and small sizes, and with a leaflet giving explanation by renowned physicians and men and women of science of the dangerous effects of intoxicating liquors, is to be spread and given out by physicians, in their waiting rooms, in the public consultation hours for young mothers, which are being opened everywhere, infant homes, women's hospitals, etc.

We took care to win the sympathies of the women members of Parliament in order to secure their votes for legislative purposes. It was not difficult, because from the beginning our union has been in close connection with the Bund Deutscher Frauen Envereine. Naturally the greater part of these members have come from the women's movement. With the support of various women's unions, we made petitions, for instance, for the introduction of local option, an earlier hour of police, to save our food from being fermented, etc.

We used every possible lever to hinder new licenses and promote through our fifty branches, the establishment of refreshment rooms without alcohol. In 1913 we built and opened a first-class one, our "Konigin Luise Haus" in Leipzig, which is valued as a pattern for the whole of Germany, and visited by numerous people from home and abroad, particularly at the time of the Leipzig Fair.

It is self-understood that we devote great attention to our youth, and endeavor to introduce temperance instruction in every kind of school. At present, this is possible only through traveling teachers, but we hope that soon it will be introduced by law in all German schools and seminaries.

Sweden to Vote on Prohibition August 27

On August 27 the Swedish people will vote on the question, "Do you want prohibition of the making, selling and possessing of intoxicating liquors?" If the vote taken at that time is favorable to prohibition, a dry law will then be prepared by the legal committee of the Swedish Parliament and acted upon by that body, but it will not be considered unless at least 60 per cent of all votes cast are in favor of it. It is believed that the votes of the women will swing the balance in favor of prohibition.

No-License Areas of Scotland Show Good Results

The report of the Temperance Committee about to be placed before the general assembly of the Church of Scotland is heartening for the workers in areas where "No License" nearly won its way in 1920. From some of the areas which voted dry at that time, testimony has been received regarding the absenc from the streets of intoxicated persons the greatly decreased number of polic court cases, reduction in the number o constables required, increase in the vol ume of business done by merchants, an better attendance at church.

India Interested in Prohibitior Demonstration of United States

"India is interested in the Unite States—oh, so interested!" says Mis Mary Campbell, World's W. C. T. U. or ganizer and delegate to the World's W. C T. U. convention. "The people rea eagerly everything that comes over th Associated Press wires from this country They are looking to the United States fo leadership. Hundreds of high cast Hindus have told me they are proud o the stand this country has taken on pro hibition. It would be a terrible calamit if the people of the United States shoul relax in their efforts to make the cour try bone dry or if they should take backward step by permitting the manu facture of beer and wine.

"You should know that the people o India as a whole are well-informed, continues Miss Campbell. "They tak their daily papers in which are printe the Associated Press dispatches from a parts of the world. If any big piece o news should break in the United State today the people of India would rea about it and discuss it eagerly tomorrow They will read about the deaths in th miners' war in Illinois and be shocked b it. They will wonder how such thing can happen—in America, their ideal of country as nearly perfect as any countr can possibly be. If Congress should vot to weaken the effects of the constitu tional prohibitory amendment, how dis appointed the white-ribboners and other in India would be."

ROLL CALL OF NATIONS AT WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

When the roll of the nations of the world is called at the World's W. C. T. U. Convention to be held November 11-16 in Philadelphia, response will be heard from a great host of countries.

The story of the progress of the anti-alcohol movement in South America will be told by Miss Hardynia K. Norville, World's W. C. T. U. organizer, and Miss Muriel Ayres, who recently returned from Argentina. Mrs. Berta De Maria de Santiago, leader of the young people's work in Uruguay, will be one of the delegates. Conditions in Chile, Peru, Brazil, as well as in Argentina and Uruguay, will be set forth by Miss Anna Adams Gordon, who will also report the situation in Mexico and the Bahama Islands.

Mrs. E. J. Simonds, the newly elected president of the Cuba W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Florence E. Atkins, who did such remarkable organizing work in the island, will delight all with a tale of the revival of interest among the Cubans.

Many representatives are expected from India, among them Mary Campbell, World's W. C. T. U. organizer, whose book, "The Power House of Pathankot" has been widely read and translated into native dialects. Dr. Mary Cutler, president of the W. C. T. U. of Korea, will give the latest news from the little country where she has worked for many years. A former president of Burma, Mrs. F. K. Singiser, will present a graphic picture of the needs of that interesting land. Miss Uta Hayashi, noted educator of Japan, and possibly also Madam Kubishiro, national corresponding secretary, will bear messages from the Sunrise Kingdom. From Australia will come Mrs. W. H. Carvosso, national corresponding secretary. Mrs. Eva C. Wheeler, who campaigned in New Zealand in its last drive for national prohibition will tell of her experiences. Mrs. Lydia Johnson, who is speaking in Sweden in the present campaign, will report what she has seen and heard during these past few months. Mrs. Deborah K. Livingston, fresh from her tour of South Africa, will relate a wonderful story of the awakening in that great territory. Miss Maria Stenroth, the noted author of Finland, and Baroness de Laveleye of Belgium will bring word from their respective countries. A large representation from England and Scotland will undoubtedly come with Miss Agnes E. Slack, one of the honorary secretaries of the World's W. C. T. U., and a big delegation from Canada is expected to accompany Mrs. Blanche Read Johnston, honorary World's secretary.

Almost every mail brings news of comrades from foreign lands who are hoping to attend the big Philadelphia meeting.

"Miss Uta Hayashi Will Be Angry"

Leila Bull

A few years ago when the Osaka (Japan) city government established public restaurants to combat profiteering, the question of allowing alcoholic beverages to be served in them was debated, and decided negatively by Mayor Ikegami, who said: "If we allow sake, Miss Uta Hayashi will be angry." This incident shows the influence wielded by the president of the Osaka W. C. T. U. Twenty-three years ago Miss Hayashi organized this branch with thirty-three members. Today there are 1,200 names on its roll. Its membership is composed largely of the most active of the women of the Christian churches of the city, but in it are also many non-Christian women in sympathy with the temperance and purity aims of the society. Miss Hayashi says that for the latter the W. C. T. U. is a ladder by which they can climb up into the Christian church. Already many have so climbed, led by the strong evangelistic influence, the wonderful faith, and the practical and successful activities of the society. Among the departments of work purity is of equal importance with temperance in Japan. Three times have the members of the Osaka union, under Miss Hayashi's leadership, fought against the rebuilding of prostitute quarters, which had been destroyed by fire, with complete success except in the last instance, when the enemy secretly obtained permission from the home minister to build in another place outside the city limits. In the attempt to get this decision reversed, public opinion in Osaka and all over the country was aroused. The principal great daily newspapers took up the fight on the side of purity, opening their columns for statements of facts.

Sixteen years ago Miss Hayashi visited America, and on her return established, in connection with a headquarters for the Osaka branch of the W. C. T. U., a Woman's Home, to help the women who were coming from all parts of the country to find employment, or for study, in this great commercial city. With wonderful faith in the power of prayer for success in a work which glorified God, this courageous little leader, with absolutely no resources of her own, borrowed from a member the necessary funds for the purchase of a house and lot, making herself personally responsible for the return of the amount in a certain term of years. More than 10,000 girls have been protected and placed in suitable positions through this establishment. Some are pupils in special schools, others are telephone operators or business girls, but a great majority are house servants. The interests of all are carefully watched over, and twice a year they are invited to a reunion, when prizes are awarded to every one who has succeeded in keeping her place successfully for a year or more. The work proved so popular that it was possible to secure funds to repay the debt by solicitation and also to erect a new and larger building, where there are accommodations for thirty boarders, practically all of whom attend the daily prayers at 6:30 every morning, and the weekly Bible classes.

Uta Hayashi, one of the delegates to World's Convention

Two years ago Miss Hayashi received a decoration from the Emperor for her services to society through the Woman's Home and the Widely Loving Society.

It was thirty years ago that Miss Hayashi gave up a lucrative and delightful position as teacher in St. Margaret's School for Girls, at the nation's capital, and went into the country to help with the development of an institution for the rescue and education of unfortunate children. Circumstances forced the institution to remove to the suburbs of Osaka two years later, with the little family of children, and no resources except strong faith in the promises of God, and capacity for hard work. A Christian friend rented them a farm. The story of the struggles of this industrial orphanage is too long to tell here, but this work of faith has grown, under God's guidance, through the consecrated endeavors of Miss Hayashi and Mr. and Mrs. Jitsunosuke Kobashi, until now the plant is a little village clustered around the chapel and school house, containing cottages for homes for the 130 children, divided into families, with work rooms for the different occupations, not only of farming, but of carpentering, rope and envelope making, and the raising of silk worms.

In Self Defense the Church Must Fight the Liquor Traffic

"The Church must fight the drink curse in self-defense," says J. Waskom Pickett of the Methodist Church, writing in the Indian Witness. "Drink is an enemy of the Church. Everything the Church seeks to accomplish drink tends to prevent. Everything the Church seeks to eliminate from the hearts of men drink fosters. Everything that blights manhood and womanhood finds an ally in drink. Drink raids the very inner precincts of the Church itself and carries its members off to haunts of sin and death. To leave drink alone, in the hope that drink will leave it alone, would be a suicidal policy.

"In India, the Church must fight the drink curse, to save herself from the libel of being drink's friend and defender. The true attitude of Christianity toward intoxicating liquors is misundertsood by multitudes in India. So many nominal Christians have indulged in drink, that non-Christians in vast numbers have thought the Christian religion was not opposed to such indulgence. Patriotic Indians have been known to oppose Christianity, because they have thought its progress would mean increased use of intoxicants. A prominent Hindu politician says that he would have become a Christian in young manhood, but for the drunkenness he found among Christians. He was afraid to bring up a family among Christians, lest his sons learn to drink or his daughters marry drunkards. A young Mohammedan said that the greatest surprise that came to him from reading the Bible was to learn of its opposition to drink; since his observations had led him to believe that all Christians drink."

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES AND OTHER INFLUENTIAL ORGANIZATIONS

W. C. T. U. speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

(Through your local papers give wide-spread publicity to the resolutions thus secured.)

Atrocious Falsehoods About Prohibition Published in Australian Papers

The city officials of Portland, Oregon, are righteously indignant over an article which has recently appeared in The Sun, a newspaper of Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, in which it was declared that pupils in a Portland public school were dismissed for riotous drinking.

The story reads:

"The boys and girls at the Prince Alfred public school near Portland, Oregon, had a half holiday not long ago. The reason was that in the morning session five of the scholars, between twelve and sixteen years old, appeared carrying bottles of moonshine. The bottles were passed around the school and the children soon became so riotous that the teacher had to dismiss them for the day. One of the boys boasted that he was independent of bootleggers, as he had his own still."

The article went on to say that the story had been brought by a mining expert of Queenstown on his return from the United States, who further declared, "Everybody drinks in America from the President and the judges and the doctors to the young boys at school."

It is unnecessary to say to intelligent American readers that the tale has not a particle of foundation in fact. "The story is absurd on its face," says Mayor Baker of Portland. "There never has been and never will be a school in Portland with the prefix 'Prince' before it. The article is a libel on the city and on every resident. It is untrue in every reference to this city." The other city officials expressed themselves in like terms. The county and city school boards declare that no school bearing a name even remotely like that of "Prince Alfred" exists in the vicinity.

The mayor of Portland gives as a possible explanation of this libelous article, that some time ago when a commissioner from Australia was in this country studying prohibition, he received some very strong letters from the city in support of the dry laws. These letters were circulated throughout Australia and the story may have been published to counteract their effect.

The incident is another illustration that atrocious falsehoods are being circulated by the press of foreign lands, giving to their people an entirely erroneous idea of the effects of prohibition in our country.

If any of our readers have correspondents in Australia, it might be well to clip this statement and send to them, that they may be in a position to refute the falsehoods when they come to their attention.

In sending money to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to THE UNION SIGNAL, or the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, please either send a draft or Chicago or New York, a postoffice money order, or add five cents to pay cost of exchange on checks or drafts on local banks. Cashier's or certified checks are not exempt from this charge, which is made necessary by the ruling of the Chicago Clearing House, through which all checks sent to us pass for collection.

That Reassuring "Eventually"

"Eventually, prohibition is going to be enforced." So said a drinking man recently to the editor of the Oakland (California) Enquirer. The reason given for his opinion is worth noting: The various organizations for prohibition and law enforcement "are very active in hunting out violators of the law; when they find violators they insist that the Federal authorities raid; they are constantly stinging the enforcement officers into activity; they never let up; if they think an official is derelict or careless in the performance of his duties, they report him to Washington. Busybodies, if you please, but busybodies who get results."

Such a comment coming from one who is of the drinking class, has much weight. "They never let up." In this simple statement lies the secret of the success which has come to the temperance forces of this country. It reminds us again of the old, old story which we all know so well—of the victory that accompanied the hosts of Israel so long as Moses' hands were upheld. Just as the foes gained, when through weariness he allowed his hands to fall, so now, even though we seem assured of victory, our hands must not fail in their task.

A certain missionary often tells of a prayer she prayed, when, sick and alone in a country district of the foreign field, she was tempted to give up and go back to her homeland, and, she adds, "It is, perhaps, the one prayer which, variously worded, comes oftenest from the lips of the missionary worker: 'Lord, give me grit and grace, and I'll stick'."

Is it not a prayer greatly needed by the temperance workers during these coming weeks and months? The weather is warm and it is easy to relax; people call us "cranks"; many excuses arise in our minds for not doing our utmost to secure victory at the polls. But in any or all cases, the same prayer is fitting—"'Lord, give me grit and grace and I'll stick'" at this work, no matter what my particular difficulty. I'll stick until the Eighteenth Amendment and the Enforcement Code are so firmly established that they can never be displaced; stick until the people of all countries have learned of the harm done by alcohol and are willing to put it away forever; stick until life itself is done, and I receive the message, "Well done—thou hast been faithful."

Lutherans Not Against Prohibition

Newspapers unfriendly to prohibition have given publicity to the views of certain German Lutheran pastors as indicating that the great body of clergymen and laymen of that denomination are opposed to the dry law. As a matter of fact this attitude is held only by ministers of the German section of this Church. In an open letter published in the Chicago Tribune, Rev. F. L. Schreckenberg, pastor of the Trinity English Lutheran Church at Appleton, Wisconsin, calls attention to the fact that the German pastors whose interviews were antagonistic to prohibition represent only a small proportion of the Lutherans of America, 150,000 in number, whereas the United Lutheran Church in America, representing 1,500,000 baptized members, has made its position plain by a resolution adopted at the second biennial convention held in Washington, D. C., in October, 1920, which said:

"Whereas, The legislatures of the several states and the Congress of the United States have adopted the constitutional amendment prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage;

"Resolved, (1) That we hereby express our great gratification in the elimination of what was formerly known as the American saloon, with the liquor traffic which established and supported it, believing it to have been hurtful to the economic and moral welfare of the people of our land.

"(2) That we are opposed to any and all measures looking to the return of the saloon, and that we earnestly admonish our people, as Christian and patriotic citizens, to stand firmly for obedience to and enforcement of the prohibition laws of our country."

NOTES ON ENTERTAINMENT

WORLD'S AND NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

We are being asked by delegates the location of hotels in the vicinity of the Academy. The Bellevue-Stratford is one-half block north on Broad street; the Stenton one-half block south and on the opposite side of Broad street; Hotel Walton is just across Broad from the Academy; the Lorraine, seven blocks north; the Majestic nine, both on Broad street with a trolley car on 13th and 15th streets; Hotel Colonnade two and one-half blocks; St. James one and one-half blocks. The Longacre is less than one block away; the Aldine, six; the Belgravia, five; while the Normandie is twenty-three blocks from the Academy, the latter a direct, quick ride on one line of cars. The Y. W. C. A. Central, 18th and Arch St., is seven blocks distant and the League's Branch but one and one-half. The Y. W. C. A.'s do not entertain many transients.

Because of a feeling among the delegates that our hotel rates are high, we are arranging for lodging and breakfast in private homes at $1.00 per day, but since the Academy is in the center of the business section, these homes are necessarily some distance away, generally from one-half to three-quarters of an hour's ride, and sometimes on two lines of cars, so that delegates asking for this kind of entertainment will please be prepared for the distance. The question has been asked if visitors may put up at the Bellevue-Stratford. Yes, as long as the accommodations hold out, and we will also count on the three hundred we hope will select that hotel. This committee is well organized and desires to make all reservations at the hotels and homes, using for confirmation of assignments return postal cards, which will be the guarantee to both parties. We will consider it no trouble at all to place satisfactorily all delegates and visitors for either or both conventions. Our one desire is to serve and please you well.

Giving Them the Truth

Margaret B. Platt

Crucial days are before us. It is the judgment of many that we have never before in the history of the war for prohibition faced a more critical time. From now until the ballots are cast in November, "our folks" must be "vigilant, active and brave." We must win and we must win by so great majorities as to convince those who seek to destroy the Eighteenth Amendment and the Enforcement Code that their efforts are useless. American voters have decided against the traffic in intoxicating liquors in any form and their decision must stand.

Large numbers of people do not understand the reasons why alcoholic liquors are outlawed. Many of these are foreign-born and come to us from lands where there was little or no anti-alcohol education or sentiment, and they cannot comprehend why we have prohibition here. They are resentful and sullen, and become the easy and willing victims of those who violate the law and pander to the alcohol appetite for the sake of gain. Millions of people who can never attend our public schools must nevertheless receive the temperance instruction that will show them "Why America Voted Dry" and convince them that for their own personal good and the future welfare of their families they must renounce alcohol in all forms and render willing obedience to the laws of their adopted country. Hence, it behooves our temperance forces to carry on during the coming months an intensive educational campaign. Our local workers should, with most kindly spirit and gracious manner, reach the homes of their neighbors who are uninformed, and with all patience and tactfulness help them to a true understanding of the situation, showing by means of the most helpful material obtainable why alcoholic liquors are harmful to the individual and why their use among the people is injurious to the nation and detrimental to the true progress of civilization. The women in the homes must be reached with the truth.

Much, too, may be accomplished by leaving in the homes, not only of foreign born people, but many Americans as well, wisely selected literature stating why wine and beer are harmful, why they are not healthful or wholesome beverages, and, therefore, must not be used. Such literature should also be distributed at all summer assemblies and gatherings of varied character. Organization reunions, fairs, conventions, out-door meetings, rallies, etc., offer opportunity for such work. Literature also setting forth the sanctity of the Constitution, the majesty of the law, the citizen's share in creating laws and his duty of obedience to lawfully constituted authority, should be widely and persistently used. Such literature should be placed in the hands of pastors, Sunday school officers and teachers, other organization leaders, and each requested to make use, in public addresses and private conversation, of the material thus obtained. Men's and women's clubs should be reached with an appeal to place the facts before their members and the facts should be placed in their hands.

The seriousness of the situation justifies herculean efforts to bring home the truth to the minds of the people. Once permeate the nation thoroughly with the truth about alcohol and the efforts of the A. A. P. A. and kindred societies will come to naught. "The truth shall make us free" from the tyranny of strong drink. Use it.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.—Matt. 6:33.

Chilean President a Bible Student

More or less public mention has been made concerning the religious interest of the president of Chile who has started a promising reformation in that republic. In a recent conversation with a leading American churchman he said, "I may tell you that the only book I have in my bed chamber is the Bible. I read it every day and try to make it my guide. Don't understand that I am a Protestant, for I am not. Neither am I a Catholic. But I believe that I am a true Christian and for this reason believe that I will succeed in my reform program. I believe that your country is great, not because you are great business people, and organize great business enterprises, but you are able to succeed in these things because you are a Bible reading people. I want Chile to follow your example in this matter that we also may be truly great."

We cannot continue as a Republic, we cannot rise to any true level of greatness unless the greatness is based upon and conditioned by a high and brave type of spiritual life. —Theodore Roosevelt.

Medal Contests

Adelia E. Carman, World's and National Superintendent

Splendid and many are the opportunities to hold contests during the school vacation period. Every union should have at least one. The contest can be made a success in village, city, or country school house.

A state president said in THE UNION SIGNAL that some unions declare it is almost impossible in the summer to secure an audience for a temperance speaker aud suggested that the message be taken to audiences already gathered at fairs and other assemblies. This is a good idea. Hold a contest at every public gathering possible, having a good program with an invited speaker.

Superintendents should help contestants in choosing selections; law enforcement should be included and also Americanizatiou. No reference should be made to the saloon; this subject should be dropped definitely. The New Century reciters are silent in the matter but many of the old books contain selections that were very necessary when we were working to secure national prohibition. Discard these and choose selections on total abstinence, those denouncing wine and beer, and the descriptive readings and stories.

The new Peace book contains some fine selections and the new Spanish reciter will be appreciated by contest workers living in communities where there are Latin speaking peoples.

I am still appealing for recitations, as I cannot publish reciters without them. There are many good writers and lecturers who could with very little trouble send in a selection that would be greatly appreciated. I offer ten dollars for the one three judges decide best if I have twenty responses. Try to win this prize. Do not write more than one thousand words and on one of the four departments emphasized this year, or a story cut down to the required length will be acceptable. I have a splendid anti-cigaret program that I will send for two cents to cover postage.

I call again for the old reciters Nos. 21, 22 and 23, to complete my file. I would also like No. 7, No. 15, and the three Demorest books, and will remit as soon as received.

Several months ago I sent a letter to all presidents of foreign countries in which the W. C. T. U. is organized, asking that they inform me if they have adopted the Medal Contest department and whether they have a superintendent. I received replies from several but there are others I desire to hear from. Contests are being held but under the auspices of church missions, or committees from different temperance organizations. May I have a reply soon from those who have not yet responded?

Contests were being held in Haiti, Jamaica, Porto Rico, and Cuba, but Spanish reciters were exhausted and work ceased. Now there is a new Spanish reciter and I am hoping the contests will be resumed.

I am very desirous of having a complete report. Will you help me to get it? Report blanks have been sent to each state superintendent, and I would like to have them filled out and returned to me by October 15.

A Woman Citizen's Relation to the Law

and at great expense. In the face of these laws, the theft of automobiles amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars, yet there is no organized propaganda in newspapers, moving picture and other theaters, by paid orators, for the repeal of these laws, the limitation of the thefts to a stated percentage, or to have the government sanction the thefts and become a partner in the business.

The "Thou Shalt Not" is the same in both forms of crime, with the exception that the unlawful use of liquors is prohibited in the Constitution of the United States and some of the states. In other words, they are part of the basic and fundamental laws which are supreme over all forms of statutory law, and wherein a statute fails to conform to such constitution it is void.

By right of heritage, by right of our absolute title to prohibition, we may now say to every officer of the state, are you for the Constitution, or against it? To every candidate for office, are you for the Constitution, or against it? To every unofficial private citizen, are you for the Constitution, or against it? To every law-breaking citizen outside the jails, are you for the Constitution, or against it? And we may, in each and every case, expect an affirmative answer.

During the great world war, all Christian America thrilled in response to a high idealism. We learned to think patriotism, to breathe patriotism, to talk patriotism.

We cleansed our private speech and our public press. We made much of following the flag. We were proud of our country, notwithstanding the profiteers, slackers, draft dodgers and other blatherskites who made a blot on our idealism. Our breasts swelled with patriotism; our throats filled with the thrill of love for flag and country; our eyes filled with tears for the devotion shown by our young men; our hearts filled with thankfulness that we were able to help; our hands filled with practical personal assistance..... It is time for us to show the same love, loyalty and allegiance to our Constitution and laws that we have to our flag, and to take steps to make that allegiance practical and visible.

By changing one word, substituting the word "Constitution" for the word "Union" and without in any way destroying the sense, I can give to you a direct appeal from the immortal Abraham Lincoln whose great heart was full of the burden of trying to restore to health this Union which had just undergone a major operation:

"I appeal to you again to constantly bear in mind that not with politicians, not with presidents, not with office seekers, but with you, is the question, 'Shall the Constitution and shall the liberties of this country be preserved to the latest generations?'"

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life.

MRS. J. D. KENNARD, of Lawrence, Kansas. For many years Mrs. Kennard has been associated with all welfare activities and has been a power for good in the community, finding time, with her many home duties, to serve in church, Sunday school, and among the young people. Under her leadership the W. C. T. U. became the banner union of the state in membership, and has been an outstanding force for civic and social betterment. She was an inspiration to the young folks, a friend to all with whom she was associated.

MRS. NELLIE E. HIGGINS, of Aurora, Illinois, seventy-nine years young, a charter member of the Aurora W. C. T. U., corresponding secretary for several years, and at the time Frances E. Willard spoke at Aurora. Mrs. Higgins never lost an opportunity of promoting the work of the W. C. T. U. through church and Sunday school. She was greatly beloved and will be missed by a large circle of friends.

MRS. ORRA A. KAYS, Eureka, Kansas, a pioneer worker in the W. C. T. U. in the days of its unpopularity. Mrs. Kays was actively identified with the organization from her young womanhood; was president of the first district of Missouri, and at other times held the office of county and local president; she organized the Hyattsville (Md.) union. In one town she was refused permission to hold meetings of the Loyal Temperance Legion in the churches, so organized a Temperance Sunday School, which met every Sunday afternoon. Mrs. Kays is the mother of Mrs. Lucretia Kays Hanson, president of the Mill Valley (Calif.) W. C. T. U., and of Mrs. Flora Kays Hanson, president of the Marcy W. C. T. U. of Evanston, Illinois.

Students of Many Countries in Anti-Alcohol Campaigns

A sober world in a decade? Not at all improbable. Many indications point that way. None is more emphatic than the fact that large numbers of students in foreign countries are organized for the study and discussion of the alcohol question. The following is taken from a survey made by the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association:

Austria has three national student organizations working actively. At Vienna was recently held a large meeting for complete national prohibition.

In Belgium, the general student movement, "Mouvement Estudiantin pour La Culture Morale," includes study and discussion of alcoholism in its program. The University of Brussels has a course of lectures on the alcohol problem.

Bulgaria reports 41 local societies with 2,750 members in its Students' Temperance Union, organized in the universities and high schools.

Chinese students going home from the United States have carried the germs of anti-alcohol activity from the Chinese Students' Prohibition League in the United States.

In Czecho-Slovakia, the student movement was started by professors who are now high in government affairs. The student organization, whose ideal is "for a higher nation," is active in high schools and universities. It already reports more than 600 members.

Denmark organized a student abstinence league in 1903 which has continued active ever since. It has 500 members, with local clubs in the university, colleges of technology, and teacher training schools.

Esthonia writes of a new movement which has just sprung up in the University of Dorpat and is spreading to other student centers.

In Finland there are two student groups; one among the Finnish speaking students has 4,000 members, and the other, among the Swedish speaking students, is smaller.

In France, the organized movement has not reached the universities, but is organized in the lower schools by the Federation Interlycenne with some members in the universities. This movement is active and is growing. Individual professors in the universities are agitating the problem. Thus, at the University of Lyons, the speech at the formal opening of the year was on "Prohibition in America." There is some activity among the grade schools.

In Great Britain, the National Temperance League, College Section, is engaged in practical anti-alcohol work. Also the Y. M. C. A. is encouraging study and discussion of the whole question as one of its social service activities. Several of the universities are holding public debates. In Scotland and Ireland, local groups for study and discussion have been formed in several colleges.

Gorman universities have abstinence societies, sometimes with hundreds of members; they hold big lectures for the students and create sentiment against beer-drinking customs. The Catholic students have two national organizations, one reporting 10,000 members. As in Austria, the movement is a part of the new movement for national idealism.

There are three national groups in Holland, all active and growing. Every university, gymnasium, and teachers' college has an organized group.

Norway has a student organization which makes prominent drink-free social customs, a new and better type of athletics, lecture courses, and personal abstinence.

Sweden has one organization for all classes of students. It has 4,500 members and 125 local clubs. Its publications, courses of study, lecture courses, and examination requirements, as well as its social activities, are of high character. It has done much toward the national prohibition referendum which is to occur in August.

Switzerland has three organized activities among the men and one among the girls. Much of this centers around local groups like our fraternities, but stressing the one theme of anti-alcoholism. The German-speaking and French-speaking students have separate organizations.

In India, the students are leaders in boycotting drinking places and in creating sentiment for prohibition. There is no national student organization but several schools report local organizations.

In Australia and New Zealand, students of the colleges, universities, and higher private schools are sharing in the preparation for the prohibition referendum which takes place in several states in 1922 and 1923.

Three Kinds of Workers

There are three kinds of Christian workers—canal barges, sailing ships, and Atlantic liners.

The canal barges need to be dragged to the work. Often they do wonderfully well, but on the whole one volunteer is better than three pressed men.

The sailing ships make fine going so long as wind and tide are with them, but when things get hard, when "the winds are contrary," when the work is discouraging, they turn tail and sail away.

But give me the Atlantic liner type of worker, the man who can fight his way through wind and tempest, because within there burns the hot throb of the mighty furnace of the love of Christ.—Dr. W. M. Mackay.

Young People of China Sacrificing Time and Talent for Anti-Alcohol Movement, Writes Frances Wang

"At present we have about 6,000 members of the W. C. T. U. in China, and about 90 per cent are students," writes Frances Willard Wang. "They need constant attention and help. So this year we have been publishing a quarterly paper; the first issue was out only a few weeks ago. Occasionally I send circular letters to them. This is helping a great deal in keeping up their interest. It is all good but I feel some definite work ought to be done by the student members so as to make their interest grow.

"About four weeks ago, I arranged a student members' rally," continues Miss Wang. "About three hundred boys and girls from college to primary were present. The rally was held in an open tent. Speeches were made and songs were sung, and each school was responsible for one stunt. The whole thing was very lively and unique and everyone enjoyed it to the utmost. We had pictures taken and also eats. Before the meeting adjourned, delegates from each school were elected. Following the rally a delegation meeting was held on the lovely lawn and I presided. Can you guess what was the result? A City Students' Alliance was organized. It probably would better be called in English by the name, Interschool Temperance Association of Shanghai of the W. C. T. U. of China. We will hold another meeting to ratify the constitution and then elect officers. The young people of China are sacrificing their time and worldly pleasure in trying their best in every way to rebuild this great country of ours."

Children and Youth of Australia in "Clean the City" Campaign

The inauguration recently in Sydney, Australia, of a "Clean the City" campaign, was marked by a great Temperance and Mother's Day rally, 2,000 children marching in two processions, each headed by a squad of Y. M. C. A. boys with brooms and banners. The brooms suggested a clean sweep, and the banners bore the words: "Clean the City Campaign. Start right now—sweep away the liquor traffic from the path of your children." One most encouraging and significant fact was the wide interest shown by the various organizations. Assistance was rendered by the Boy Scouts, Naval Brigade, Y. M. C. A., Society of Christian Endeavor, W. C. T. U., Rechabites, Good Templars, Sons of Temperance, Salvation Army, Orphanage Boys, City Mission, Sunday schools of all denominations, and others.

Among Our Workers

The day following the close of the International Sunday School convention in Kansas City, a delightful reception was given Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, World's and National W. C. T. U. superintendent of the Sunday School department, by the W. C. T. U. Federation of that city, Mrs. Fannie L. Taylor, president. The guests assembled in the home of Mrs. Mahoney and were given opportunity to hear Mrs. Irvine speak on "Sunday School Temperance Work." A "moving picture" and tableaux formed a pleasing part of the program. Mrs. Taylor called out the officers of the federation, the superintendents of departments, and presidents of local unions in a happy fashion, and then the guests formed the background of the tableaux. The Chautauqua salute was given the national superintendent and she, in turn, asked that the salute might be given for each of the national general officers, naming them.

Then, at Mrs. Irvine's request, a silent salute with handkerchiefs was given to the sainted comrades from Missouri. The names of Clara C. Hoffman and Eliza B. Ingalls were mentioned reverently, followed by a brief prayer.

Mrs. Irvine gave brief addresses in three departments and before the assembly of the Christian Sunday school, the largest in the city, and also addressed the general assembly of the Methodist Sunday school.

At a luncheon given for the women preachers in attendance at the convention, some twelve or fifteen, Mrs. Irvine was one of the speakers.

Mrs. Mary Harris Armor has just completed a month's service in Pennsylvania. Her itinerary was well arranged, so that she began her travels in Matamoras, Pike county, continued through the northeastern, northern and central parts of the state, and on down through the western counties, finally concluding her pilgrimage at Hazelwood, Allegheny county, in all visiting twenty counties and delivering twenty-four addresses. In two of the places where she spoke, Mrs. Armor was one of a band of three forming the "Whirlwind Brigade," Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the state W. C. T. U., and Dr. R. H. Martin, the "bootlegger catcher" of Beaver county, being the others, in one case. In the other, Mrs. R. B. Robinson, president of Allegheny county, was one of her co-workers. Successful meetings were reported in each place.

Mrs. Armor, with her usual vigor and force, was at her best wherever she was, and "her best is the best best that there is." As often as she has been in Pennsylvania, the women are always eager to have her again, and many requests for her aid have to be refused. The Pennsylvania women recognize the fact that she is a wonderful woman, and she is well beloved by them. In her tour of New Zealand, which she is soon to make in the interest of prohibition, she will have their prayers for strength for her great task, and for a safe return to continue the work for law enforcement in the United States.

A BARGAIN!

Nearly every business has its dull seasons and offers bargains to maintain trade during the slump in patronage. The WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION is alert to modern business methods and therefore offers bargain rates on WORLD'S CONVENTION STICKERS ordered before the last of August, when old prices will prevail again. Like all other business people we will store them without charge and deliver when desired.

Beginning with this notice, on all orders received until August 31, the rate per thousand will be two dollars. We will send you five hundred for one dollar and twenty-five cents or one-hundred-and twenty-five stickers for fifty cents.

Elephants Rout Rum Caravan in African Bush

A story of how the prohibition cause in Africa was aided by a herd of wild elephants is told by the Reverend Thomas B. Brinton, missionary to Musumba, Congo Belge, for the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal church, reporting to Methodist headquarters in Chicago. According to Mr. Brinton, a caravan of about fifty native carriers laden with liquor, some of it destined for the Belgian officials at Kabongo and Musumba, was proceeding northward through the jungles above Bukama, where ends the Cape-to-Cairo railroad. The men were sighted from afar across the veldt by a herd of elephants on a rampage. Trumpeting madly, the beasts charged down on the long line of black burden-bearers, who dropped the cases of perfectly good Scotch, Rye, Burgundy and Port, and scurried to some nearby undergrowth, into which they disappeared like so many rabbits. The elephants reached the path and found nothing upon which to vent their rage at this desecration of their native solitudes but the innocent cases of sparkling booze. They trampled them to fragments. Not a single bottle neck remained unbroken, according to Reverend Brinton, who takes a savage joy in telling the story.

In the jungle the missionaries are regarded as strange white men when they decline a gourd of home brew or "civilized hootch" offered by a hospitable chief. The prohibition issue is being forced into the jungle, according to Mr. Brinton, for no alcoholic beverages either of native, or white, local, or foreign manufacture are allowed in the new mission villages being settled by native Christians about the stations.

W. C. T. U. Personalia

On Thursday evening, July sixth, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Pritchard celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at their home in Montclair, New Jersey. A great many friends and relatives were present. Among the W. C. T. U. guests were Mrs. Ella A. Boole, Miss Florence Boole, Mrs. Lyversa De Silva, Mr. and Mrs. George C. Hall, Mrs. Phoebe Wilbur Griffin and Dr. and Mrs. D. Leigh Colvin and daughter, Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Pritchard have been loyal workers in the Covenanter Church and for many years Mr. Pritchard has been editor of the Christian Nation. Both have been advocates of prohibition. Mrs. Harriet Pritchard is World's W. C. T. U. superintendent of the department of Purity in Literature and Art; was national superintendent for many years until it was merged, and is still New York state superintendent of that department. Mr. and Mrs. Pritchard have two sons and three daughters living and thirteen grandchildren, all of whom were present. Mrs. Anna P. George, one of the daughters, was publicity director for the National W. C. T. U. for one year and all of the "children" are workers for prohibition. Many kind words of appreciation were spoken by representatives of the Covenanter Church and by Mrs. Boole, representing the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Judge Charles A. Pollock of Fargo, North Dakota, who spent six months last year abroad studying conditions relative to prohibition and speaking in many of the leading cities of Europe, was the speaker on W. C. T. U. Day, Sunday afternoon, July 2, at the Valley City Chautauqua Assembly. Fully 2,500 people listened eagerly to the Judge as he spoke eloquently and impressively on "World Prohibition and Law Enforcement," showing clearly that as America goes, so goes the world. Mrs. Fred M. Wanner, vice-president of the state W. C. T. U., introduced the speaker with well chosen words, and rare music added to the enjoyment of the occasion.

An interesting Christian Citizenship institute was held quite recently in the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Salt Lake City, under the direction of Mrs. Stewart McLeese, assisted by Mrs. W. F. Carroll, local superintendent for the Willard W. C. T. U. Mrs. W. F. Core spoke earnestly on "The Citizen's Duty," Mrs. J. Stein read a paper on "Why a Christian Citizenship," and Mrs. W. A. Wight discussed the Constitution of the United States. Rev. Frank Bross, in a telling address, set before the audience the methods by which candidates are nominated. "The Eighteenth Amendment can never be repealed," he said. "The next Congress will be stronger in dry members than this one." A leaflet on obeying the law was read by Mrs. C. R. Sanders. Mrs. A. Hamilton spoke on government for the alien and Mrs. O. W. Porter on Americanization. A very spirited time was had while Prof. M. E. Jones gave a drill on parliamentary law. Altogether, the program was most inspiring and helpful.

Principle, Party or Person?

"The very desperation of the drinking classes—their willingness to defy death itself in order to satisfy the abnormal craving for 'booze'—is one of the most conclusive evidences of the very real dangers that attend the habitual use of intoxicating liquors," the Kokomo (Ind.) Dispatch reminds its readers.

"The cursed appetite is insatiable. It grows stronger the more it is fed. It is a cruel and absolutely selfish tyrant. There is no compromising with it. It must rule or ruin; or, rather, it must rule and ruin or be whipped 'to a frazzle.'

"But now that the full horrors of the drink habit have been exposed to the world in all their enormity through the horrible disclosures resulting from the constant lessening of the supply, the good citizens and sane and normal minds of this country will make a heroic and determined fight for the maintenance of prohibition in our constitution, and for the strengthening rather than the weakening of all the laws that will give full and complete effect to its enforcement.

"And all candidates for seats in either house of congress, whatever their party affiliation, or whatever their personal preferences on this issue, may as well understand first as last, that the temperance forces of their constituencies will support only those candidates who can be depended on to fight for the Eighteenth Constitutional Amendment, and all the Federal laws that will promote or insure its enforcement.

"They will from now on reverse the old outworn practice: They will no longer sacrifice the principle for the party or the man; but if necessary to secure good results, they will not hesitate to sacrifice the party or the man, in order to save and promote the right principles of government. They will not compromise, for they know that compromise means failure."

Prohibition Has Made Good

(Chicago Evening Post, June 22).

Last Monday Judge Gemmill sat on the bench of the old Harrison Street police court. It was his first appearance there since prohibition went into effect. Naturally he was interested to note whether the effect of prohibition was observable in this catch-all for offenders.

The first thing that impressed him was that he sat alone. In former days two judges had been necessary to dispose of Monday's business—the accumulation from Saturday and Sunday. But, by noon, Judge Gemmill, single-handed, had cleaned up the docket and was lunching with friends at a loop club.

The second thing that impressed him was that, instead of from 350 to 400 cases, there were less than 200; and the third thing, that, instead of from 150 to 200 cases directly traceable to intoxication, there were but twenty-two.

Among the companions of the judge at lunch was a business man, the head of a Chicago industry said to be the third largest of its kind in the world. He said, "I am convinced from what I have seen that prohibition is the best thing that has ever happened to the United States. It is as effective as any law on the statute books. We will never repeal it."

THE DETROIT ATHLETIC CLUB HAS ORDERED THE SUSPENSION OF ANY MEMBERS WHO BRING LIQUOR INTO THE CLUBHOUSE, and, according to press reports, has posted a notice that it was not the wish of the house committee to deprive members of their rights and privileges, but that in reality "it was the Constitution of the United States that took away the privilege." The San Bernardino (Cal.) Telegram is of the opinion that no better statement of the duty which rests upon every American so long as the Eighteenth Amendment exists could be made.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit, and she learns that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb, wounded, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. Because of her ill health Fortescue sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle, where she is easily led to take, first an alcoholized "medicine," and then the liquors offered by friends. Returning to Seraneb, she continues to drink, and wanders to Harford's bungalow one evening, after being turned out of the club, thus becoming a subject for gossip which her husband hears. He upbraids her, and she pours out her soul to Dr. Scott, who takes her to her hospital for treatment. Meanwhile, the friendship between Harford and Kathleen grows stronger. She accepts an invitation for a motor-car ride with him and while resting in the garden of a Mohammedan tomb, he tells her of his love and of his sad heritage. She writes to American scientists for advice. Fortescue is taken dangerously ill and Angela goes to him at Naini Tal.)

CHAPTER XXV

Seraneb was at its emptiest and dustiest; every one was away who could get off. Harford and Kathleen remained, and perhaps were the two busiest people in the station.

A large portion of Fortescue's work was given to Harford who rarely had time to himself. Yet occasionally he took Kathleen out in his motor-car, where, alone with each other and the sunset, they lived in a little heaven of rapturous communion. They visited many strange shrines, hidden away from the sight of the usual globe-trotter. One day they stood together by the Sacred River. The blue waters and the yellow sand were lovely except for a little group of huts made of matted straw, and a curious sunken tank, which they discovered was a shrine. A hideous idol lay on its back, with arms and legs outstretched in a menacing attitude. It was painted scarlet, as symbolical of the blood sacrifice, and had fierce, staring, tinfoil eyes. An old priest, seeing them approach, came out of a grass hut. The holy man was naked, except for a small saffron-colored cloth, a string of carved beads round his neck, and the sacred cord over his left shoulder. He was very infirm, and hobbled painfully up to the shrine, and sprinkled some holy water over the god's sacred person, as if to keep it from the defilement of the Sahib's presence.

Harford nodded to him, and began to talk. The old Brahmin babbled on at a great length, and Kathleen made out that he was talking about the Koombh Mela!

"It is a great feast," she explained to Harford. "I saw it three years ago, at Allahabad, where the Jumna meets the Ganges, and it is said three millions went during the weeks of the fair; they go to bathe, and believe every sin is gotten rid of in the sacred waters!"

"It is an easy kind of religion—to wash and be clean," said Harford, as they strolled back to the car. On their way home these words, "Wash and be clean," recurred many times in their conversation. Kathleen spoke to her lover of her Saviour, as she had not done before. He responded warmly.

"I wish I had your simple faith, my dearest. I long to have the tangled skein of religion unravelled."

"It is just this, you must leave the tangle to God. 'If any man will do His will he shall know of the doctrine.'"

"I am striving to do this, Kathleen," he said, humbly.

"I know you are, and I fancy you are nearer to God than I am. Have you found out that I love my own way? I am getting to be an autocrat!"

"You shall rule me, darling; I have no fear."

"How silly we are, building castles in the air."

"Not in the air, in my heart! There is a palace which holds my queen there."

And thus they whiled away the hot evenings, with intercourse at once serious and playful.

The mail brought letters from America, as usual, for Angela; these Kathleen forwarded with a letter asking for information of the invalid. A postcard only came in answer: "Frank is very ill; doctors tell me he cannot recover for many weeks."

Harford said he had heard in the station that Fortescue had abscess of the liver, and added that he never thought of him as a robust man; too fond of the pleasures of the table, he never seemed to drink to excess, but habitually took what would undermine any constitution and destroy the resisting power to disease.

"The nemesis is upon him," exclaimed Kathleen, when a postcard reached her a few days later, saying, "Mem Sahiba is in the hospital with the Sahib, he dying."

Another three days passed, no news; on the fourth day Harford brought a newspaper with the account of the lamented death of the Deputy Commissioner of Seraneb of abscess of the liver and dysentery at Naini Tal.

Kathleen wrote at once to Angela, but received no answer; then wrote to Divan Singh—still no news.

"What can we do? How shall we find out where Angela is?"

"Write to the Ramsay Hospital," and Kathleen did so. The answer came after a week's waiting, "Mrs. Fortescue has gone to the Savoy Hotel."

Letters remained unanswered, weeks passed. Kathleen became distraught. "I feel responsible for her," she said to Harford.

"I can get off for Sunday; shall I run up and find out about her?"

"Can you? Oh, do! It will set my heart at rest."

He arrived, and lost no time in appearing at the hotel. He sent in his card and a waiter conducted him to the door of Mrs. Fortescue's suite of rooms.

The Ayah came—"Mem Sahiba behosh hai" (is delirious).

"Can I see her? Who is her doctor?"

"Civil Surgeon; he say no one to see her," explained the Ayah.

"Where is Divan Singh?"

"He very ill, in bazaar hospital."

"I will see him," and he rode off at once. He found the faithful servant with an injured foot, occasioned by a fall down the khud (precipice), in trying to prevent an accident to his mistress. He had intercepted her as she stumbled and lost her footing at the edge of a precipice thereby breaking his ankle. The pain was terrible, and the doctors prohibited his removal. He bewailed his fate in being separated from his Mem Sahiba.

"When did she begin to take drink again?"

"When Sahib died, she very faint, hospital doctor give her brandy. Huzoor! send for Dr. Scott Sahiba!"

"I will." Harford saw no other course and telegraphed for Kathleen.

It took two days to arrange for her absence; she had to wire for a friend, a medical missionary from Jumpara, to take the oversight of the hospital.

When Kathleen arrived in Naini Tal, she found Angela in a pitiable state. The loss of volitional power, accompanied by sleeplessness and low delirium, showed her brain to be heavily charged with blood, consequent on alcoholic excess. The Civil Surgeon seemed glad to see Kathleen; he informed her that everyone in the hotel thought Mrs. Fortescue was ill from fever; and he had not enlightened them, only prohibited her being seen by any one. He hinted at the Ayah's love of drink; he should have replaced her, but she seemed fond of the baby, and under the circumstances, he saw no way out of the difficulty.

"Do you have many such patients?" asked Kathleen.

"It is not infrequent that ladies are ill from drink in hotels," he said, "but this is a bad case, for Mrs. Fortescue has a very weak heart!"

Kathleen decided to cable at once for Mrs. Mortimer, and asked Harford on his arrival in Seraneb the next day to do this for her.

It was a week before Angela was able to be moved. The rains were beginning, and Kathleen judged it better to take her down to Seraneb, than to leave her in Naini Tal. It was a week of fierce strife with the enemy. Kathleen often came from that bedside white as death, scalding tears pouring from her eyes, lips tightly compressed with the pain of the struggle. What delirium it was!

Poor Angela seemed to be whirling in a vortex of dreams, where demons crouched ready to spring upon her; where tangles of serpents encompassed her, and a fiery pit flamed to receive her. With piercing shrieks she would complain, "millions of knives are cutting me." She was hopelessly dominated by alcohol, as a hypnotic patient is ruled by the operator. As the poison was gradually eliminated from her system, the delirium ceased: then came a period when melancholy without hope, without consolation, possessed her; black despair enveloped her as a cloud. She begged to be allowed to die.

"I am a beast, not fit to live, dear Kathleen. Why should I not kill myself and have done with it all?"

With tender, soothing words, Kathleen encouraged the poor, tempest-tossed soul. Her brave spirit, which set aside her own pain to minister comfort, had the joy of seeing the blood-shot eyes and drooping lids grow clear and soft, the fragile, willowy figure able to sit up, and the feeble voice calling for her baby boy.

Kathleen knew that Angela could not live long; her heart was irremediably damaged. With care, she might last a few months, and Kathleen prayed that her mother might come in time to comfort her at the last.

By easy stages they journeyed back to Seraneb, and Angela and her boy became once more inmates of the Mission hospital. Mr. Fortescue's affairs were not settled, but his trustees paid amply for the widow and child. The unfaithful Ayah was replaced by a European nurse, of middle age, a Christian woman with excellent references.

The child had outgrown his early delicacy, and was a fine looking, clear-eyed fellow, with his mother's rose-leaf complexion, but though he grew in outward beauty, his mind remained undeveloped, and Kathleen who had little time to give to him, felt when she did see him, that there was something abnormal about him. Angela, quite a novice with children, thought him more than equal to any baby. It was the new nurse who first put Kathleen's unspoken thought into words.

"Is the boy all right in his mind, Dr. Scott?"

"Why do you ask, nurse?"

"He takes so little notice of objects, and I doubt much if he recognizes his mother. Then what a vacant stare he has! Most children of fifteen months are very lively, this boy seldom laughs."

"I must watch him and study his development, but do not breathe a word to anyone, nurse!"

Poor Angela must be kept from even a suspicion of there being anything wrong with her boy. Her soul still dwelt in shadow, and many were her moans for her wasted, unhappy life.

"It has been an utter failure! I have not even had a good man's love!" she would say, and again, "Oh, how loathsome I feel. When shall I be clean in my own sight?"

Kathleen would talk to her with exquisite tenderness of the power of Christ to cleanse and heal, and Angela would lift her hands to heaven, and cry and weep. "If there be any power outside myself high or low, good or bad, may it help me."

And now another struggle came upon her. Heaven or hell! Spiritual life or death! But—prayer prevailed for her, and she came out of that dark valley exhausted (for her heart attacks became more frequent and she suffered much), but able to say,—"Pain is a great angel! He has brought me to Christ!"

She grew weaker and weaker, but her mind, free from the hypnotism of alcohol, became clear and bright. She took a deep interest in the love between Kathleen and Harford. Her own feeling towards him was dead, drowned in the black waters of alcoholic excess.

She liked to see her "props," as she called them, together, and declared they made a "handsome couple." She was told of the reason for delay in their engagement, and looked forward to the important letter with anxiety only second to theirs.

"If Wishes Were Horses"

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

Can you remember when that little couplet was repeated to you? It may be you are reciting it to some one today: "If wishes were horses, beggars could ride". You may make it more emphatic by announcing, "If some folks had a backbone where the 'wishbone' is, much would be accomplished."

Might it not be time well spent to inquire about our own "wishbones"?

Wishbone says, "I wish people would see what an enormous amount of good has resulted from the Eighteenth Amendment, and obey it."

Backbone says, "I must and will help inform people of the great benefits already obtained from the Eighteenth Amendment so they will want to obey it. I will spread broadcast the facts by taking and supplying others with THE UNION SIGNAL."

Wishbone: "I wish our children could be interested in better, higher things."

Backbone: "I will organize an L. T. L. and start with the little tots to interest children in the best in life. THE YOUNG CRUSADER will help me."

Wishbone: "I wish something might be done to show young men and women the effect of all intemperance and to educate them in a single standard of purity."

Backbone: "The young men and women must be helped to keep from, and to break up bad habits. I will form a Young People's Branch of the W. C. T. U. and, with the assistance of the scientific temperance articles in THE UNION SIGNAL, teach them."

Wishbone: "I wish people would realize the seriousness of the prohibition situation at this time and make it their work to get the right men elected to high positions."

Backbone: "I know this is a critical time for prohibition. I will do my part in arousing the people and presenting the truth about it. I will find out and inform others as to who are worthy to occupy positions for the betterment of the country."

Wishbone: "I wish the good citizens of these United States would consider the constant outgoing of false reports to other nations regarding the results of prohibition, and realize how closely and hopefully all are looking to us to make and keep perfect what has been won."

Backbone: "The nations must be authentically informed as to prohibition's results. Heartsick women, good men and sorely tempted men are all watching and praying for the success of prohibition. I will not fail them. I will furnish them true reports by sending them THE UNION SIGNAL. I'll remember what our action means to the world and do my best to hold what has been attained."

Have you a wishbone or a backbone? We hope to hear from you.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

ACTION OF NATIONAL EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION CONGRESSIONALLY RECORDED — STERLING-LEHLBACH BILL UNDER CONSIDERATION BY APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE— MOVE TO ABOLISH SENIORITY RULE—FIRST WOMAN DIPLOMAT APPOINTED —TACNA-ARICA AGREEMENT CONCLUDED

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

The Senate continues at work on the Tariff bill from day to day, convening at 11 o'clock, a. m. "on the expiration of the recess," and closing the day, soon after 6 o'clock in the evening. The Senate recesses, not adjourns, from one day to the next while the tariff is pending. There are pages and pages yet of the Tariff bill, which does not sound very encouraging for an early adjournment of this Senate, but it is said that with the cotton schedule disposed of, the most controversial items will have been passed, and then progress will be more rapid.

Action of National Editorial Association Congressionally Recorded

Senator Jones of Washington had read into the Congressional Record the resolution passed by the National Editorial Association which pointed out the opportunity of the newspapers to give substantial aid to the cause of law and order by refusing to publish any of the so-called jokes on and sneers at the Eighteenth Amendment.

STERLING-LEHLBACH RECLASSIFICATION BILL FOR THE FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE

Its Importance to Women

From the standpoint of women, the Sterling-Lehlbach bill is doubly important because by its specific provision against sex discrimination it proposes the first and only effective method of legislating out of existence the conditions which have so largely kept women employes of the Civil Service in the minor and lowest paid positions, though they be as well and often are better qualified than men for the better positions.

Provisions of the Sterling-Lehlbach Bill

The Sterling-Lehlbach bill, which is designed to remedy these conditions and put the government on a more efficient and businesslike basis, provides for:

(1) Classification of the Civil Service positions into services, such as professional, sub-professional, clerical, custodial, inspectional, etc., each service divided into a maximum number of six or seven grades. Nurses and librarians are for the first time given full professional recognition.

(2) Salaries on the basis of skill, training and responsibility of the work performed.

(3) Advance of salary within grades in accordance with efficiency ratings.

(4) Promotion from grade to grade on proved qualifications under rules of the Civil Service Commission.

(5) A uniform system of efficiency ratings to be established by the Civil Service Commission in co-operation with department executives, and accessible to employes.

(6) A minimum efficiency standard below which employes will not be retained in the service.

(7) Administration of the reclassification on the basis of equal pay for equal work without regard to sex.

(8) Allocation of employes to the various salary grades by the United States Civil Service Commission after consultation with the department heads.

Supporters of the Sterling-Lehlbach Bill

The bill has the support of the majority leader of the Senate, Senator Lodge, and its passage by the House was actively aided by Majority Leader Mondell. The minority leader of the Senate, Senator Underwood, declares himself for it. The Senate Committee on Civil Service recommends it, and the Steering Committee has scheduled it for passage. It is recommended by the United States Civil Service Commission, and is urgently advocated by the employes through their organization, the National Federation of Federal Employes. The public is supporting it through numerous organizations, including the National Civil Service Reform League, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Federation of Labor, the National Women's Trade Union League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the National League of Women Voters, the American Association of University Women, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, and various other societies interested in efficient public service.

The Sterling-Lehlbach Bill is under consideration by the Appropriations Committee, members of which are given here:

Francis E. Warren, of Wyoming.
Reed Smoot, of Utah.
Wesley L. Jones, of Washington.
Charles Curtis, of Kansas.
William S. Kenyon, of Iowa.
Frederick Hale, of Maine.
Selden P. Spencer, of Missouri.
Lawrence C. Phipps, of Colorado.
Truman H. Newberry, of Michigan.
William B. McKinley, of Illinois.
Lee S. Overman, of North Carolina.
Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma.
Charles A. Culberson, of Texas.
William J. Harris, of Georgia.
Carter Glass, of Virginia.
Andrieus A. Jones, of New Mexico.

If your state is represented on this committee, write your Senator at once of your interest in this bill.

Move to Abolish Seniority Rule

Some of the Senators have inaugurated a campaign to abrogate the seniority rule under which Senators of the longest continuous service are given the chairmanship of committees without regard to ability for the positions of vital importance in legislation.

Working in conjunction with the Senators is a group of Representatives who aim to smash the seniority rule in the House.

Although it is not a formal rule in either house, and is only an unwritten party tradition, the seniority rule has never been violated by either party in the Senate since the custom became firmly established, and only once in the House since the days of Speaker Cannon. The rule was broken last year, when Representative Madden of Illinois was promoted to the chairmanship of the Appropriations Committee over the ranking member, Representative Davis, of Minnesota. Senator McCormick, of Illinois, proposes to initiate the fight with a letter to the Senate leader, suggesting that the conference of Senators of the majority party abrogate the rule and provide that the members of each committee shall elect a chairman, leaving to the Committee of Committees the designation of committee members. As the custom now obtains, the Committee of Committees designates also the chairman of each committee, and for that place selects the ranking member in years of continuous service on the committee.

Announcement of the First Woman Diplomat

Woman is making her way faster and faster into fields that heretofore have been exclusively occupied by men. Her rejection as one entitled to a seat in the House of Peers was a challenge which it was felt soon would cause that most traditional of all of the traditional bodies to reverse itself and bow to the spirit of the age. In this country, the full enfranchisement of woman has resulted directly in the naming of two of the sex as standard bearers of one of the major parties in campaigns for the choosing of Senators of the United States—Minnesota and Wisconsin. Woman is already in Congress in the lower branch, and is running for state legislative seats in many states. And now she is in diplomacy, but not in the person of an American woman serving the United States government. Mlle. Nadiza Stancioff has been appointed First Secretary of the Bulgarian Legation in Washington, and will be here in the autumn to take up her duties. She has already informed interviewers in Europe that her idea of the greatest contribution woman can give to the diplomatic service is to give to it "the human touch."

The Tacna-Arica Agreement

An event of great importance to the peace of the Western Hemisphere was recorded when the forty-year problem of the Pacific made an important step for its happy ending. When the plenipotentiaries of Chile and Peru penned their signatures to the agreement to arbitrate the long controversies over the province of Tacna and Arica, using the good offices of the United States as arbitrator, there was taken, in the words of Secretary Hughes, "the greatest forward step in the interest of peace on this hemisphere which this generation has witnessed. The conference has been here in session for many weeks and the outcome is a great triumph.

The concluding ceremonies were held in the Hall of the Americans of the Pan American Union in the presence of many members of the Foreign Diplomatic Corps and high officials of the United States. After the last signature had been set down, accredited spokesmen for Chile, Peru, and the United States expressed in a series of addresses the gratification of their governments over the settlement.

ew York Concern Asks Destruction of Own Pre-Prohibition Liquor Stock

John S. Parsons, chief prohibition enrcement agent for New York City, reıived the surprise of his life rccently ıen a man called him up on the teleone and said, "Now, listen, Mr. Parıns, this is Walter Wurmsley, manager B. B. Davis & Co., and I have a real jo for a few of your agents right here our premises," supplementing this inrmation with the request that six men sent over "to destroy some choice lands of liquor, wines, and cordials ıich we no longer want on our hands."

"So far as is known," says the Philalphia North American, "this was the ist time the owner of any kind of liquor d voluntarily asked for its confiscation d destruction. Mr. Parsons delegated rum sleuths to go to the plant, and . Wurmsley led them (voluntarily) to a rear room, where the pre-prohibiın brands were stored.

"'Take it out and spill it in the gutter,' ordered. 'We are sick and tired of ying government taxes on this stuff, ıich we have had in our stock for more ın fifteen years.'"

The liquor was disposed of in the manr requested.

abbis to Throw Pulpits Open to Women Aspirants

Believing in the fullest measure of lf-expression for women, as well as the mplete utilization of their gifts in serce of the highest kind, and asserting at in keeping with the spirit of the e, "women cannot be justly denied the ivilege of ordination," the central conrence of American rabbis, which met cently in Cape May, N. J., adopted a solution to throw pulpits open to omen aspirants.

President National Editorial Association Declares Newspapers Must Give Substantial Aid to Cause of Law and Order

An urgent appeal to his fellow editors to aid the enforcement of law by refusing to publish so-called jokes and sneers on the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution was made by J. C. Brimblecom, editor of the Newton Graphic, acting president of the National Editorial Association, at the annual convention of that organization, meeting at Missoula, Montana. Mr. Brimblecom said in part:

"The newspapers of this country, particularly the newspapers which go into the homes of our people, have a great opportunity at the present time to give substantial aid to the cause of law and order by refusing to publish any of the so-called jokes and sneers on the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. No matter what you or I may say or think as individuals, of the merits or demerits of prohibition, we must never forget that it is the fundamental law of the land and is entitled to as much respect as the laws against murder, theft or treason.

"For if you and I claim the privilege of violating, with impunity, the law regarding intoxicating liquors, we must admit the rights of others to violate any or all other laws regarding which they may have similar opinions. Such a condition spells anarchy, nothing less. There must be no discrimination in the enforcement of law and every published joke or sneer regarding prohibition adds just so much to the general unrest which is altogether too prevalent in this country."

How You Can Keep Cool

Dr. William H. Evans, former Health commissioner of Chicago, tells one of the secrets of keeping cool, as published in the "How to Keep Well" column of The Chicago Tribune of July 17, as follows:

"Drink no alcoholic beverages of any sort. In the first place, drinking alcoholic beverages sends an excessive amount of blood to the skin. The skin is about the only tissue in the body that can feel heat. The blood is hot. Therefore, drinking alcoholic beverages makes you feel hotter than you are.

"Comparing the summer of 1921 with that of 1916, we find that the former was much the hotter. On the other hand, the deaths from heat in Chicago during 1921 were 26 as compared with 535 in 1916.

"Most cases of sunstroke were cases of beerstroke, as this column has contended for years."

Episcopal Bishops for Eighteenth Amendment

Presiding Bishop Gailor of the Protestant Episcopal Church, speaking in New York against prohibition, stirred up the diocesan bishops in that section of the country to disagree with him openly. Since he made his unfortunate speech, Bishop Manning of New York, Bishop Lines of Newark, Bishop Matthews of New Jersey, Bishop Brewster of Connecticut, Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, Bishop Perry of Rhode Island, and Bishop Cook of Delaware have all pointedly and publicly spoken in support of the Eighteenth Amendment.

IANY STRONG ORGANIZATIONS WORKING TO NULLIFY NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION

Between thirty and forty organizations the United States are said to be active- at work to overthrow and nullify the ighteenth Amendment and the Volstead ct. At the head of the list is the Naonal Association Against the Prohibition mendment, which claims a membership nearly half a million, and maintains eadquarters at Washington, D. C.

It makes no secret of its purpose, which to elect next November a Congress iat can be depended upon to vote for modification of the Volstead Act to ermit a return of "light wines and beer."

One part of their program, according to he Christian Science Monitor, which publishing an illuminating series of rticles on the activities of these organiıtions, is to keep constantly before the ublic the argument that a beverage with o higher alcoholic content than 2.75 per ent is innocuous, that it will be a great evenue producer and at the same time ill reduce the illicit traffic. Authors, ublishers, professional men and poliicians have been enlisted in that part f the campaign. As a sample of that orm of propaganda, Peter G. Boyle, a ublisher at 267 West 17th St., New ork City, sends out a letter to the clubs, rganizations and individuals as follows:

APPEAL FOR INDEPENDENCE

"Inclosed please find an anti-prohibition ooklet, which needs no explanation. hall we as American citizens allow a arrow-minded fanatical and dictatorial lass to take from us that which we prize bove all else as a nation—personal liberty and freedom of thought and action in all that was guaranteed us under the Constitution? If our rights can be torn from us as easily as they have been by the questionable Eighteenth Amendment where will such insanity end? If we do not resent this class injustice with our votes for those who will rectify it, we shall, no doubt, be treated to prohibition of tea, tobacco, coffee, candy, dancing, music, movies, theaters, auto-riding and other so-called reform amendments ad nauseam.

"There are vast numbers of Americans laboring under the delusion that the Eighteenth Amendment can never be repealed. Let all such disabuse their minds of that idea. After the Eighteenth Amendment had been passed by seven short of the number required by Article 5 of the Constitution and had been ratified by more than three-fourths of the state legislatures, it was discovered that it did not specify what constituted intoxicating beverages, nor did it provide any penalty whatsoever for disobedience to this amendment.

"Section 2 provided that Congress and state legislatures should have concurrent power to enforce this Amendment by appropriate legislation. If Congress had not passed the Volstead Act nor any separate state passed its own enforcement act, the Eighteenth Amendment would have been a dead letter, for no matter how often the Amendment was violated the violator could not have been punished.

"Therefore the Volstead Act is the real bone of contention. We must see to it that that Act shall be amended to permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. When the benefits of the amendment to that act have been demonstrated its full repeal will be in order. Not, in all probability, would it ever again be possible to enact a similar unjust law.

"When this point has been reached the Eighteenth Amendment will be dead and nothing will remain but to repeal it, and remove the corpse. We respectfully submit the inclosed booklet to your organization for its approval and action. The more the subject is agitated the sooner we shall have relief from an intolerable and un-American situation."

This book is entitled "Prohibition Un-American, Un-Christian and Un-Economical," by Frederic Lyman Cobb. It is expected to sell the book in large numbers for use in the political campaigns.

THE SANITY LEAGUE OF AMERICA SEEKS TO INCREASE THE NUMBER OF VIOLATORS OF THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION LAW and thus put it out of commission, in the personal opinion of G. W. Sommer, a local attorney, according to the Spokane (Wash.) Chronicle. "The League is designed to provide jobs for a bunch of organizers who are after special donations in addition to the dollar membership dues," adds Mr. Sommer.

LIGA NACIONAL DE TEMPLANZA OF ARGENTINA DEDICATES NEW HEADQUARTERS BUILDING IN BUENOS AIRES

Hardynia K. Norville, World's W. C. T. U. Representative for South America

Doubtless the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL will be interested to know about our glorious time in Argentina on May 13, 1922, when our new building—the splendid building which dear "Mother National" gave to us for our Liga Nacional de Templanza, as well as for continental headquarters for W. C. T. U. activities—was formally inaugurated in Buenos Aires, the metropolis of this vast continent.

But before I proceed, let me beg you to forgive my long silence and in justice to myself pen a word of explanation. When our beloved young missionary, Muriel Ayres, came down to help us two years ago, feeling that she with her facile pen could write fresh and interesting accounts of the new scenes which awaited her in this beautiful land beneath the Southern Cross—accounts which would especially interest the young people, we gave to her, while studying the language, the pleasant task of keeping the home folks informed about the onward progress of our temperance cause while I served as a kind of scout-master, always on the go, seeking recruits and organizing especially in the churches and public schools. Her serious illness and enforced return to the homeland was the cause of great sorrow to her many friends. It came upon me as a dreadful calamity just at the time when I most needed her help, for on December 24 we moved into our new building with high hopes for the enlarging of our borders and the extension of our influence. For more than a month I worked night and day trying to get the place ready for our opening in February. Such a time as we had in the midst of brick-layers, carpenters, painters, electricians, gardeners, etc., tearing down walls, building others, repairing and furnishing the house. I wish the dear young people at home, who have been helping us with their prayers and donations during the past two years, might have seen the fine group of young men and girls of our "Y" department who volunteered their services as painters, house-cleaners and gardeners. We had a good, happy time working together, all enthusiastic over the thought of our formal inaugural ceremony, which we hoped to bring to pass soon after the schools opened.

But alas! that was not to be. I overtaxed my powers of endurance and had to pay the price. For six weeks I was quite ill and unable to attend to any of my public duties. The Home Kindergarten and Young People's Club, which we had managed to organize before I gave up, continued to run smoothly—thanks to the fine young ladies of my Normal Training class of last year, who are our Kindergarten teachers and social service helpers this year. They came to my bedside every day to plan their program for the next day's activities and to give their reports. We were most fortunate in securing for the English classes and also for music in the Kindergarten, Miss Cecilia Van Domselaar, a cultured Christian girl, the niece of Mrs. Carrie Van Domselaar, who is well known for her many years of devoted service to the W. C. T. U. cause in Uruguay. She came to us as an angel of mercy when Miss Ayres and I were both ill. Without her aid our Kindergarten and English classes would have suffered greatly, for English is the charm by which we attract the children and young people of the aristocratic homes.

But enough of explanation, I hope, to make you dear people understand that my failure to write has not been due to lack of appreciation for all that you have done to make possible the buying of our magnificent building which now serves not only for temperance propaganda for La Liga Nacional and a center for social service where child welfare work is especially magnified, but also for the Continental Headquarters of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Broken-Hearted Wives and Husbands Come to Headquarters with Their Sad Tales

On the front wall of our building, in a prominent place, is a large brass plate, which reads in English—"The National Temperance League of the Argentine Republic. Founded in 1916." Our insignia, the white bow, is beautifully engraved, after which follows: "Continental Headquarters for the World's Temperance Union (W. W. C. T. U.)" This sign attracts much attention and is bringing to our doors continually poor, broken-hearted wives and husbands who pour out their tales of blighted homes, feeble-minded children—the once fond mother, or husband, now a fiend while under the influence of drink, from whom the "kiddies" have to be hidden away, etc. How they plead for secrecy, almost invariably saying they do not want to disgrace their families before the world, but if we can give them any remedy, or tell them what to do, they will be eternally grateful to us. Surely those are terribly deceived who think that only chronic alcoholism exists in this beautiful land so rich in natural products, but so cursed by wines and imported liquors.

Inaugural Festival Given Much Publicity Through Press

Our grand inaugural festival took place on May 13, and was pronounced a glorious victory for our cause, not only by the multitude who attended, but by the press at large. The leading papers and magazines were splendid in giving us all of the space desired, for two weeks beforehand. On the all-important day their reporters and cameras turned out in full force, so that we were well pictured and written up. The magazines were very gracious in their graphic representations of the house and different groups that participated. The funny papers did not fail to ridicule the founding of the first Casa de Templanza (House of Temperance) in South America. They warned the Minister of Public Instruction and the President of the National Board of Education of their certain doom because they had so magnanimously co-operated with the temperance "fanatics" and had dared to publish in all of the daily papers the authorization which they had granted to fifty-four public schools (the principal ones in which we have been working during the past six years), to send their delegations consisting of five each —one teacher and four children of the higher grades to participate in the inaugural ceremony. And they came, my how they came! Mothers, fathers, teachers with their delegations—house, garden, the roof—everywhere, filled to the uttermost, while many retired b cause there was not standing room.

When the fifty-two musicians of tl splendid municipal band, which had bee graciously loaned by the mayor of tl city, began the national anthem, all sto in profound silence. Then followed tl inaugural address by the honorary pres dent of the Comision de Caballeros (Men Committee) of the Liga Nacional de Tem planza, Dr. Domingo Cabred. He known as the founder of the first An Alcoholic League among men in Sou America. Having given a lengthy r view of the development of temperan activities in this country, he pronounc the warmest words of commendation our World's W. C. T. U. and spoke of tl new hope that was born within him wh he learned that women rather than m had taken the initiative in this worl wide campaign to dethrone King Alcoh

When he referred to the great pleasu which it had afforded him to introdu the representative of the World's W. T. U. during the International Child We fare Congress in 1916, she scarcely kne herself for he represented her a most extraordinary woman who h come into their midst to inspire, to rev lutionize public sentiment and to put a to work, from the highest to the lowes for the redemption of their people fro the drink curse—and a whole lot mo which she wouldn't dare repeat. As sl sat there, facing that vast throng a surrounded by the most distinguish ladies of this fair land, as well as pro inent government officials, doctors a educators, she realized as never befo how the good God had been leading, a had put it into the hearts of Argenti leaders of the highest social position a influence to stand loyally by her, n withstanding her great weakness a many shortcomings.

Distinguished Damas in Attendance Festival

Prominent among the distinguish damas who favored us with their pr ence were Senora Julieta Meyans Pueyrredon, wife of the Minister of Fo eign Relations and honorary president the Comision Central de Damas Arge tinas; Senora Etelvina Gonzalez Chav de Torello, wife of the Minister of Pub Works, and the vice-president of o Comision Honoraria de Damas; our de patrician "mother," who is loved l everybody, Senora Julia Moreno de M eno, president of the Consejo Nacional Mujeres (National Federation of Women Clubs) and also vice-president of o Comision de Damas. She was accompa ied by the executive board of this, t most widely known woman's organiz tion of South America. Other equal influential ladies, representing some the greatest Catholic philanthropic ins tutions of the land were with us, as w as leaders of our English speaking colo —all bearing testimony to their genui interest in the temperance cause a their sincere appreciation of the genero donation which "Mother National" h sent for purchase of the building, by o dear Miss Anna Gordon, who captured hearts during her tour of South Ameri one year ago. Surely, these visible ma festations of interest, love and apprec tion are not in vain, for they serve unite us in closer bonds of union a friendship, they inspire us with n

"If ever the world sees a time when women shall come together purely and simply for the benefit and good of mankind, it will be a power such as the world has never known."—Matthew Arnold.

hope—they electrify the tired body for greater activities and give faith and courage to dare and do greater things for the advancement of our Master's kingdom on the earth.

The warmest words of encomium are due the splendid group of teachers, principals of some of the leading public schools of this city, who form our Scientific Temperance department or advisory board for scientific instruction—(we give it down here the name of Educational Committee of the Liga Nacional because we find that it works better among Latin Americans to have fewer departments). We include in the program of the Educational Committee not only scientific instruction against the use of alcohol, but also against the use of tobacco, and lessons on purity, compassion for God's weak and helpless ones are also given, while the organization of Loyal Temperance Legions in all of the schools is stressed as the goal of our endeavor. The officers of our Educational Committee are distinguished educators, who deserve the admiration and esteem of all who love the temperance cause, for the devotion and self-sacrifice which they have shown in helping your representative to establish the work among the children: President, Senorita Nice de Egoscue; vice-president, Senorita Eloisa San Pedro; treasurer, Senorita Guillermina Oliveira; general secretary, Senorita Maria Marta Moreno; inspector of scientific literature, Senorita Elia Martinez; organizer, Senorita Maria Herminia Livorno, and linked with this group of faithful friends and inspired leaders is Senor Ernesto Nelson, the great educational reformer, especially of the university life of this country. Surely more disinterested and loving help has never been given to a stranger in a strange land than these splendid teachers of great intellectual attainments and strong, noble characters have given the representative of the W. C. T. U. They have realized from the beginning of my career among them that it was their great responsibility and glorious privilege to follow the example of the teachers of the United States in moulding the character of the young life of the nation for sobriety and purity.

The three schools that organized the first Loyal Temperance Legions in this republic were the only ones invited to furnish special numbers of our fine inaugural program. All were delighted with their charming "cold water" games, songs, pantomimes and tableaux. There are no more graceful, attractive children in the world. Miss Gordon, who has seen them in one of the most handsome theatres of the world make the theme of "cold water" entrancingly beautiful, will, I am sure, justify my statement. During the intervals, a fine group of North American and English girls, attired in their Camp Fire suits, were seen here, there and everywhere in the garden (for this was an open air festival beneath stately palms and heavily laden orange trees), pinning white bows and violets on the guests, and presenting pledge-cards.

One of the most stirring numbers of the program was the magnificent address by Dr. Gregorio Araoz Alfaro, president of the National Anti-Tuberculosis Association, and also president of the Medical department of our National Temperance League. With unvarnished speech he told of the alarming amount of alcoholism among men, women and children in the provinces and, sounding the clarion note of alarm, urged all true patriots to arouse themselves and enter whole-heartedly into the desperate fight against alcohol, their nation's greatest foe.

Argentina's Great Educator Pays Tribute to Temperance Workers

Senor Ernesto Nelson, who is considered one of the greatest educational reformers of the day and is the active president of our Comision de Caballeros (Men's Committee for Propaganda and Legislation) closed the program with a short address telling of the beneficial results of prohibition in the United States. He also voiced our thanks to the numerous organizations, Catholic, evangelical and political, which had sent their delegations, and concluded with the warmest, tenderest words of encomium for the teachers and school children who are so valiantly defending the temperance cause. He then called to the platform the presidents of the three Loyal Temperance Legions that had delighted the audience with their charming numbers, and presented to each a gold medal entrusted to their keeping, but to be preserved in the school as a badge of honor in token of the high appreciation which the executive board of the National Temperance League feels for the noble initiative which these three prominent schools took, when I first came to work among them eight years ago, and whose influence and example have been so valuable.

After the speech making, our bishop's wife, Mrs. Marie A. Oldham, the official representative of the World's W. C. T. U. in Argentina (as Mrs. Carrie van Domselaar is in Uruguay), accompanied by the most prominent members of our English speaking W. C. T. U., were awaiting the guests of honor in the large kindergarten room which had been transformed into a dining-hall, made attractive by banners, plants, fruits and flowers (the superintendent of public parks and the Botanical Gardens loaned us a cart-load of their choicest plants for the occasion). The tables, loaded with sandwiches, home-made cakes and delicious fruit punch, gave a visible demonstration of the hearty co-operation of the North American and English women who stand nobly by the Argentine ladies in their fight against the common foe to the happiness of homes in all lands. Permit another digression—the Sunday before our festival, upon entering the North American church, one of the ushers, who is the son-in-law of our Crusade "mother," Mrs. Mary MacLaughlin, said, "There never was such a crusade for home-made cakes as has been carried on in this church this morning by Mrs. Oldham. She has let none escape her." And it was true, there was an abundance of cake. Devoted friends, as well as some good, indifferent North American folks, who had never shown any interest in the temperance cause away down here under the Southern Cross, were made to know that the donation of a North American home-made cake was a good way to begin. I tell you it is great to have your bishop's wife a fine, energetic, most capable and devoted advocate of the temperance cause, leading the evangelical women of South America to enlist with us in our war upon King Alcohol.

Young People Give Cheerful Service to Make Fiesta a Success

Our splendid committee of Argentine ladies, who form the advisory board for our "Y" department in Flores, assisted by the young people, served refreshments in the garden to all who could not be accommodated in the dining-hall—tea, cakes, sandwiches and fruit punch—while the municipal band furnished concert selections. It is said that more than one thousand attended. The delegations of children from the fifty-four public schools (about five hundred) were served with pretty bomboneras which the young people had made in the evenings and filled with cakes, crackers, candies and nuts, they having gone to the wholesale houses and factories and solicited contributions most cheerfully given to make glad for the little ones their first fiesta in the Casa de Templanza, which shall, we hope, always be the center of joyous, enthusiastic activities undertaken and carried through by young people and children for the advancement of our blessed cause.

Surely it is a great joy to have been privileged to represent our World's W. C. T. U. for eight years in these beautiful South American countries. God is good and I thank Him, as I pen these lines, for having granted to his humble servant the unspeakable joy of having been used by Him to arrest the thought and to arouse the interest which has culminated in the establishment of this social welfare center for the National Temperance League and continental headquarters for the World's W. C. T. U., in this beautiful land of sunshine, plants, birds and flowers; chivalrous men, warm-hearted, loving women and precious little ones, than whom there are no more beautiful, intelligent and promising children in the world.

WHAT DOES IT COST A WOMAN TO LIVE IN YOUR TOWN?

Laura Parks Miller, National Director Women in Industry

"We believe in a living wage..... And finally we pledge ourselves to labor and to pray: That all these principles, founded upon the gospel of Christ, may be worked out into the customs of society and the laws of the land."

From the Industrial Creed of the W. C. T. U.—Adopted 1875.

What is this "living wage?" Isn't it more than the absolute minimum that will support health and decency? Isn't it enough to enable the woman who labors all day for wages, to rest, or study, or go to church at night without home labor to eke out a pittance? Isn't it enough to make it possible for the mother of tomorrow to send her children to school with strong teeth, well-soled shoes, and full lunch boxes, because (trained in the industry of today) she has earned sufficient to command those "luxuries" of the poor? What does it cost the working woman who must—or should for health's sake—buy all her food ready cooked, her clothing ready made, her laundry ready done?

But not all girls have to buy all these things—then what?

Suppose Mary has to work and support herself. Helen can live at home. Her father will buy her winter coat, her mother will "just slip Helen's laundry in with the family wash," and her grandmother will do all her mending. Helen can work for half of what will keep Mary in decency. But Mary is the one who must work. If all girls were Marys, all employers would pay a living wage. Actually, in my town, Helen sets the wage and Mary must take it or starve!

How about your town? Does the M. E. Church ladies' aid run a charity home for the Marys, to save their employers' money. Or the policewoman with tears in her eyes "run in" another Mary for theft—or worse. Or the taxpayers pay for community health measures to make up for Mary's inability to spend f health?

Are you actually helping to suppo Mary? Or are you encouraging Mary employer to make bigger profits or to ru his business lazily because of what l saves in hiring women instead of men?

There's only one way to know. Fi out what the real cost of living for t working woman is, no matter who pa it.

Fill in the accompanying blanks. G your neighbors to help you. Or get a co mittee appointed at the August meeti of the union to bring in a report in Se tember. Or ask the program committ to put Women in Industry down for a reg lar meeting of the union between nc and January. Get committee members take different items. Ask Mrs. A. to co sult dentists' and doctors' records f what Mary should spend in keeping we rather than what she doesn't spend b cause she doesn't have it. Have Mrs. find out what Mary really has to spe on a winter coat that will wear t years of being out seven days a week all sorts of weather. Mrs. C. can find o how much Mary has to pay for a not ishing lunch, when she's on her feet day and going home to a boarding-hou dinner. Mrs. D. will have enough to to find out rates for a clean, warm roo etc. Count half of each item, such clothing that will last two years.

Fill in the blanks with the average not the highest or the lowest.

RAILROAD OFFICIALS STRONG FOR THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION LAW

SAFETY FIRST THE CHIEF REASON

The Manufacturers Record, of Baltimore, has published a second edition of "The Prohibition Question, Viewed from the Economic and Moral Standpoint." This second edition contains many expressions of opinion from railroad officials, manufacturers and other prominent people in regard to the operation of the prohibition law. They are worthy of close study.

Prior to Adoption of Eighteenth Amendment Had Repeated Occasion to Discipline Employes for Drinking, but Only Three Times Since

"We have long had and still have the following rule in effect on this road: 'The use of intoxicants by employes while on duty is prohibited. Their use, or the frequenting of places where they are sold, is sufficient cause for dismissal.'

"Prior to the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, we had repeated occasion to discipline employes for the use of intoxicating liquors, sometimes because of such use while on duty and sometimes because of the frequenting of saloons while off duty. Since the Amendment became effective, we have had only three employes disciplined for the violation of the rule quoted. We have not taken any formal expression of the views of employes, but our operating officials are firmly of the opinion that practically all of the employes are in favor of the strict enforcement of the rule as essential to the safety of employes, of the public, and of railroad property. "E. R. DARLOW,

"President Buffalo & Susquehanna Railroad Corporation."

Railroad Rule Against Drinking Great Value in Elimination of Majority of Accidents, and Its Enforcement Aided by Adoption of Prohibition

"Rule G, which is a part of the established regulations on all railroads, reads as follows: 'The use of intoxicants by employes while on duty is prohibited. Their use, or the frequenting of places where they are sold, is sufficient cause for dismissal.'

"This rule is rigidly enforced and there is no question but that it has been of the very greatest value in the elimination of the majority of accidents. Its enforcement has been greatly aided by the adoption of prohibition in localities and states, and later by the Federal Government. "CARL R. GRAY,

"President Union Pacific System."

Railroad Men Realize Use of Liquor Introduces Increased Hazard for Themselves and Public

"Regarding the effect of prohibition on railroad employes and its relation to railroad accidents generally.

"Rule G of our Operating Book of Rules reads as follows: 'The use of intoxicants while on or off duty, or the visiting of saloons or places where liquor is sold, is prohibited. Any violation of this rule by employes connected with train operation will be sufficient cause for dismissal.'

"This rule has been in effect, in its present form, since May 17, 1914, and in a slightly modified form, prior to that date, for a number of years.

"Prior to the enactment of the Volstead Enforcement Act there was more or less discipline imposed for violation of the rule. Since the Volstead Act there has been a material improvement in this respect, which, no doubt, has had its effect upon the matter of safety in operation, although I attribute the results which we have obtained from the standpoint of safety work more to the efficiency of our Safety Department, coupled with the hearty co-operation on the part of our employes, than I do to the enactment of the Prohibition Law.

"The employes, particularly those engaged in engine and train service, by reason of their organization beneficiary funds, and for other natural humanitarian reasons, have gradually increased their interest in safety work, which has been a very strong potential factor in safety results.

"The railroads have likewise specialized in this branch of the service.

"The locomotive engineers, as an organization, have consistently forbidden the use of intoxicants by the members, and they rarely ever, as an organization, appeal for leniency for one of their members guilty of a violation of this fundamental law of their order.

"We have found no opposition to Rule G, above quoted, on the part of our employes, as they realize, quite as keenly as we do, that the use of liquor introduces a much increased hazard, not only for the employe himself, but for others who are immediately engaged in the service with him. "E. J. PEARSON,

"President N. Y., New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co."

Prohibition Has Decreased Drinking Among Railroad Men

"We have a general rule in the Operating Department book of rules, reading as follows: 'The use of intoxicants by employes while on duty is prohibited. Their use, or the frequenting of places where it is sold, is sufficient cause for dismissal.'

"If after employment it is found that a man uses liquor to excess, he is relieved from service. This is particularly true in engine, train and station service.

"I think that prohibition has decreased drinking among railroad men when on duty. We have found no pronounced opposition to prohibition.

RALPH BUDD,

"President Great Northern Railway Co."

To me the prohibition act is essentially American in its purpose. Its aim is to develop the highest type of American character and manhood. I think it must be admitted that Washington was right when he said that our free institutions rest, in the last analysis, upon American character.

The law is essentially American, not only in its purpose but in its outlook. There is a puzzle that is sometimes given to the student of ethics, "When is good bad?" There is one answer—"Good can only be bad when it keeps us from our best."

Prohibition has not divided the nation against itself. It has rather ranged the great forces of our government squarely on one side of a great question and I am pleased to say that the real forces of Americanism are lined up on the right side of the question of law enforcement

ROY A. HAYNES,
Federal Prohibition Commissioner.

Prohibition Has Removed Temptation to Get Liquor and Railroad Rule Against It Is More Easily Enforced

"Relative to the question of prohibition and its effect upon our employes.

"Rule G is still being rigidly enforced and it must be to assure a proper grade of trainmen and proper care in handling their trains. Prohibition has made it much easier to enforce this order, because it has removed a lot of the temptation that men had when they were able to get liquor more easily. While there is still plenty of whisky to be had, yet it is necessarily expensive and hard to get.

"I do not find any pronounced opposition among our employes against the order—in fact, I know that they have accepted it as being absolutely essential to the proper operation of the railroad.

"The other benefits which come from abstinence from liquor, in better support of their families and in better treatment of their families, are, of course, also a great aid.

"Before prohibition came, however, I felt that railroad employes, particularly train service employes, were freer from the liquor habit than any other class of men.

"W. J. HARAHAN,

"President the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company."

Less Drinking Among Rank And File Since Prohibition

"Our rule regarding the use of intoxicants by railroad employes reads as follows: 'The use of intoxicants by employes while on duty is prohibited. Their use, or the frequenting of places where they are sold, is sufficient cause for dismissal.'

"This rule has been in effect for many years and we have taken from service in the past many men who frequented saloons and for that cause. As we have had this rule steadily in effect we cannot make any comparison between conditions under that rule and what conditions would be without it, but the mere fact that we have felt it necessary to have such a rule evidences our belief that it does much to lessen the danger of accidents on our line.

"We have never found any pronounced or organized opposition to Rule G; on the contrary, it seems to be accepted everywhere as proper and necessary.

"We feel that there has been less drinking among our rank and file since the prohibition law went into effect, although there is still a good deal of bootlegging.

"W. B. STOREY,

"President the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway System."

The Union Signal Vacation

In accordance with our custom for the past few years, and because of the high cost of publishing, THE UNION SIGNAL will omit two issues during the summer months. It has been decided to drop those of August 17 and August 24. Subscribers for the monthly editions will receive the regular number of papers.

The Literary Digest's Poll

The Literary Digest is taking what purports to be a nation-wide poll on prohibition. Three questions are asked of ten million voters: Do they favor the strict enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Law? Do they favor a modification of the Volstead Law to permit light wines and beer? Do they favor repealing the Prohibition Amendment?

The latest report on this poll, published July 22, covering only 200,000 ballots, shows 75,597 for enforcement; 85,151 for modification of Volstead Law; 45,646 in favor of repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

While more votes so far reported are for modification than for enforcement, it must be taken into account that the bulk of these votes come from sections of the country, for example, the Middle Atlantic States, where prohibition has had the least opportunity to demonstrate its value because of the efforts of the opponents to prevent enforcement. The North and South Central States, twenty in number, all give a majority for strict enforcement. There is every reason to believe this poll will show a preponderance of sentiment in favor of the strict enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Liquor Fabrication Exposed

Reference was made some weeks ago to the discovery that a widely circulated anti-prohibition proclamation credited to Abraham Lincoln and used by the liquor interests in campaigns for many years was a fraud, and that Rev. Sam Small, evangelist, was prepared to make affidavit to that fact. The alleged statement of Mr. Lincoln is as follows:

"Prohibition will work great injury to the cause of temperance. It is a species of intemperance itself, for it goes beyond the bounds of reason in that it attempts to control man's appetite by legislation, and in making crime out of things that are not crimes. A prohibitory law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our government was founded. I have always been laboring to protect the weaker classes from the stronger, and I can never give my consent to such a law as you propose to enact. Until my tongue be silenced in death, I will continue to fight for the rights of man."

The affidavit, which has been made public by Rev. Duncan C. Milner of Chicago, says in part:

That the Rev. Sam Jones, Henry W. Grady, the Rev. Sam Small, and many other speakers at the time the statement was first used in a local option campaign in Georgia in 1887 openly denounced the purported words of Abraham Lincoln to be a flagrant forgery, defied discovery in any recorded utterances by Lincoln, and offered a reward for proof of their genuineness, but no one produced any such proof.

That some time after the excitement of the campaign had disappeared, the Rev. Sam Small in conversation with Col. John B. Goodwin, who had been the director of the anti-prohibition forces in said campaign, was told by Colonel Goodwin, that he himself devised the circular in question, composed the alleged words of Lincoln so as to attract the adherence of the colored voters and had done so because to win them was the forlorn hope of the wets, the country at that time being under a prohibition law.

As this alleged statement by Mr. Lincoln is being used today by the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, the truth as to its origin should be given the widest possible publicity.

Tell Them What to Think!

A novelist makes one of his characters say, "People like to think they think what they think themselves. They don't. They think what their own newspapers tell them to think."

The great power of the press and of propaganda in general, was emphasized with equal vigor, though not so epigrammatically, in a recent address by Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, when he stated:

"If I were asked to name a definite result of the war, I should without hesitation say that the war has taught us how tremendous is the power of propaganda. Let the press and the platform concentrate upon one idea or purpose, and by constant effort impress it upon the minds of the people, eventually the public will become obsessed with the idea. To me, there is grave danger in the propaganda that is being waged against the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. Nothing is being left undone to impress upon the public mind the idea that the law is not operative."

"This is discouraging," says someone. It would be, except that we are learning to realize the power of good as well as of evil propaganda and that it is our right and privilege to fight false statements with the truth. For every statement against prohibition, we must have ready one in its favor; better, we must have ours first, and broadcast it more widely! To meet argument with argument, we must have facts, together with time, place, and other details.

A question box in local union meetings would promote interest and be helpful. A part of each meeting devoted to a quiz or a "spell down" on the benefits of prohibition, meeting the arguments of the wets, would also have a real value. Material for these are being furnished from week to week by THE UNION SIGNAL.

But what is the use of being supplied with facts and equipped with arguments, if they are not used? And to use them only among those who believe as we do, will not substantially aid the cause of prohibition. Why not consecrate our pens to the purpose? When asked to write a letter to an official, one worker replied, "Why, yes, if you think a letter from me will do any good, I will sit up all night, if necessary, to write it."

Is any one of us so hard pressed for time or money that she would be unwilling to write such a letter? When a paper prints a misleading statement about prohibition, or stands for beer and wine, if one person writes denouncing its policy, it will have some effect. The editor will realize that a person who has sufficient backbone to write to him has strength of character and a certain amount of influence. But if one hundred, two hundred, or five hundred people write concerning the same article, that editor will be likely to be converted to a new way of thinking with lightning-like rapidity.

The value of these and other tactics has been proved in all the campaigns of the past. The truth sown in season beside all waters, has had immeasurable results—but don't stop yet!

Tell them what to think!

A Thrilling Serial

A valuable contribution is being made to the present campaign by The Christian Science Monitor, in the form of a series of articles telling of the activities of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment and the thirty other societies that are working to nullify the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

The information given from day to day of the well-organized campaign of the enemies of prohibtion will no doubt startle many good people who have rested in the confidence that the liquor question was settled for all time by the placing in the Federal Constitution of a provision prohibiting the traffic in alcoholic beverages.

This somewhat sensational expose of the attacks on the Eighteenth Amendment tells of the maintenance by the opponents of the dry law of a force of lobbyists and political workers; the steady circulation of propaganda through the press that prohibition is a failure; the careful selection of candidates for various public offices with the intent of obtaining a working force made up from all parties that are hostile to prohibition, and an effort to control the next Congress and to bring political pressure to bear on amenable office holders of whatever rank, to the end that the interests of the liquor forces may be served.

We hope other newspapers may adopt a similar plan of throwing the searchlight of publicity on the activities of these associations. It will have the wholesome effect of awakening many good citizens to a realization of the danger that lies ahead.

What Will You Do to Help Over-Match the A. A. P. A.?

Margaret B. Platt

Listen! The A. A. P. A. publicly declares its purpose "to get the enforcement code out of the law and keep it out," and "to work for the repeal of the prohibition amendment."

The A. A. P. A. is calling "for a million members, at one dollar a year, each member promising to work for the repeal of the Volstead Act."

Order at once, read and distribute our leaflet, entitled, "Why a Million Members," which sets forth in parallel columns the purpose of the A. A. P. A. and the purpose of the W. C. T. U. This leaflet is a membership winner for the W. C. T. U., and a vote-getter for a dry Congress, dry state officials and dry legislatures everywhere, if used.

Take it to your prayer-meeting, ladies' aid, missionary society, woman's club, and other meetings. Explain its purport to those present; have membership cards and blank receipts for dues in hand. Get your new members then and there, sign the dues receipt and at once report the new names and dollars to your local treasurer.

WHY NOT A MILLION MEMBERS?

We can have them if we will.

The A. A. P. A. has taken as its slogan, "Help Us to Repeal the Volstead Law." The slogan of the W. C. T. U. is "Help Us to Hold the Volstead Law." On which side are you? Can not the women of the United States over-match the A. A. P. A.? Shall the half-century of tremendous labor of the temperance forces be overcome now by the efforts of the un-patriotic, un-American, un-Christian amalgamation of liquor forces rallied under the unholy banner of the A. A. P. A.? What are YOU going to do about it? Make the answer to your own conscience, your country, and your God, and then "GET BUSY."

AN OHIO W. C. T. U. WOMAN CLAIMS SHE HAS THE BEST BOOZE CARTOON EVER PRINTED. It shows a quart bottle of whisky on a table at which sits a young man, signing a promissory note which reads:

"Twenty years from now I promise to pay John Barleycorn the lion's share of my health and potential earning power, also years of my life."

"Prohibition may be crudely enforced today," says the Columbus (O.) Citizen, commenting editorially on the cartoon, "but it has certainly accomplished one thing—fewer young men are signing notes mortgaging their future to John Barleycorn."

ONCE A SALOON, NOW A NEWSPAPER OFFICE. It is interesting to note that the Nashville Tennessean, which has always consistently advocated prohibition and law enforcement, espousing, during the first campaign in which it participated, the cause of statewide prohibition, and supporting the late Senator Carmack for governor, has its present home in the old quarters of the "Southern Turf," once one of the famous saloons of the South.

Tribute to Mothers

An Appreciation of the Mothers of America whose heroism and devotion to the cause of liberty has invoked the sympathy and challenged the admiration of the world

BY ALVIN M. OWSLEY
National Director Americanism Commission
The American Legion

The name of Mother bears a tender significance; in it rest the aspirations and hopes of the world fulfilled. It quickens the heartbeats, stirs our minds, awakens in our souls a deeper sense of feeling than any other name. Whatsoever things are pure, sweet and lovely; whatsoever things are constant, tender, merciful and good—all are glorified in the name of Mother.

Her touch is as the angel's hand; her voice as the whisper from above; her smile is as the reward from Heaven—it is finer than gold and more precious than rubies. She is the ladder by the brook where man dreams; she reaches up to Heaven, and upon the rungs of her soul angels ascend and descend.

The great war brought all sons nearer and closer to their Mothers. O, what a wonderful love is Mother's! It knows no beginning and it knows no ending; it comes before man is born and it lives on when man is gone. It runs to the infinite as steadfast, as tender, as constant, as everlasting as God. Mother and God are one in the hearts of the boys of America. The sacrifice of the great war made this more so than ever before. When on the battlefield, on the land, on the seas, in the face of the enemy or sleeping under God's skies—everywhere, the thought of Mother and Mother-love was the silent, comforting spirit that whispered to the anxious heart of the soldier, sailor and marine—"Be strong and of good courage. Be not afraid. I will not fail nor forsake you." Her prayers for the defenders of America, the sons of Mothers, uttered during the war, were made permanent in the hearts of men. Who is not moved to emotion when he remembers his Mother's prayer to the God-of-War: "Make him the pride of his country. Keep him the hope of my heart, the nest of my dreams, the chosen one of my love, my treasure of treasures, that I give to my God and my country."

O Mothers of men, in your wonderful eyes I see the shining soul of the All-Lover. Would that all could do such things in such Godlike ways! The wonder of wonders! The mystery of mysteries! The love of all loves! The queen and ruler of our hearts! This is your day—Mother's Day. Upon your brow we place the jeweled crown which tells of your conquering love, a love that has subdued the world. Before your throne we kneel with compassionate hearts, seeking forgiveness of our shortcomings and give to you the praise and adoration that springs from manly hearts touched with a sense of your wondrous beauty and power.

Texas W. C. T. U. in Summer Emergency Campaign

Mrs. Claude De Van Watts, the newly elected president of the Texas W. C. T. U., has inaugurated a special summer emergency campaign to prepare the way for the primaries and the November election. Anti-beer and anti-wine literature is being distributed; candidates questioned as to their attitude toward prohibition, and every possible effort put forth to insure the election of dry Congressmen. Three methods are being used to secure new members: Verbal invitations; written invitations, and house-to-house visits. At a recent institute held in Austin, a demonstration was given by membership solicitors, showing how to meet those who hesitated or refused to become members. By the simple invitation method Austin secured forty new members. A house-to-house campaign is now in progress, and 200 new members have been gained. Austin hopes to demonstrate to the state how interesting and profitable a campaign of this character can be.

Oklahoma's "Stay-at-Home" Membership Campaign

The Oklahoma W. C. T. U. is in a lively "Stay-at-Home" Membership Campaign. Mrs. Josephine M. Buhl, state president, makes the following suggestions for gaining new members:

Call your neighbors or friends over the telephone and ask them to join. Then make an appointment with them to collect their dues. (If it's hot, just turn on the electric fan or secure a large palm leaf fan, and keep cool while you talk.)

Invite your friends and neighbors in. Make a cool drink, some lemonade or grape juice, and while all are being refreshed, get out your pledge cards and ask them to sign them.

Invite women who are not already members, to take a ride in your car in the evenings, and while you are cooling off, tell them of that greatest of women's organizations, and ask them to join.

After church services on Sunday, or after the mid-week prayer service, speak to as many women as you can, and ask them to join.

Hold W. C. T. U. picnics and mass meetings in the parks, secure a good speaker and have her make a call for members.

Every woman securing one or more new members during the month of August, will have her name placed on the Honor Roll of the "Stay-at-Homes Membership Campaign."

Safeguarding the Future

Myrta E. Lockwood, Recording Secretary, Michigan W. C. T. U.

Child Welfare—the biggest program before us—and there is no Child Welfare that does not include Parent Welfare!

"Every child has a right to be well-born"—true enough, but how about the "kiddies" who were denied this right, and mayhap their parents before them. Some poet has said:

"Blessed are the men and women
Of noble brain and heart,
Who go down into the folk swamp,
And take the children's part."

This is where the Loyal Temperance Legion comes in: To train for citizenship! To safeguard the future! To develop the fathers and mothers of tomorrow! For we build for tomorrow!

To prepare or repair is good but we must repair and prepare. Repair prenatal influences and early training. Prepare for real life. The dressmaker takes a garment; here a touch and there a touch and it looks like new.

What of the lessons of the Loyal Temperance Legion? Let us write them in bold type—and may they mean more than ever before:

Learn to live.
Learn to lift loads.
Learn to love the better things.
Learn to light the way of those who come after.
Learn to lead—oh, the crying need for leaders!

Patriotic National Prohibition Guards. Red-blooded boys and girls like to do big things. Talks in schools and L. T. L's make them see what it means to make a life—and as they salute the flag, and pledge allegiance to the country for which it stands, they promise to uphold the Constitution. Blessings of liberty from licensed wrong to themselves and their posterity, and with us they recall the words of President Harding to the blind soldiers who gave their eyes for our flag: "There will never be a substitute for the Stars and Stripes you last beheld." We declare our Constitution—on which rests the future of America—is safe in the hands of the boys and girls—if we do our part!

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Why Sign the Pledge?

Mildred A. Potter, Falconer, New York.

I am proud to be a member of an organization that really does things. I heard of two young health enthusiasts who were discussing the merits of physical training. One said, "Well, Bill, are you still keeping up your daily morning baths?" Bill answered heartily, "I surely am. Sometimes I take them hot, sometimes I take them cold; and when I'm in a hurry I take them for granted." The Y. P. B. is not 'taking it for granted' that its work was finished January 16, 1920.

A requirement for membership in the Y. P. B. is the signing of the triple pledge. I asked a few Y. P. B. members why they had signed the pledge. One replied: "I signed the pledge so I could join the Y. P. B." Another said: "Because you asked me to." Someone else signed because a chum did, and another in order to induce her friends to sign. Doubtless many are persuaded to do it so that they might have a vow to keep, something to make them stronger in time of temptation.

In these crude reasons are the nuclei of the principles of pledge signing: (1) to benefit the individual by strengthening his principles, (2) to influence others by a good example (3) to serve the community, nation and world through the Y. P. B.

What is the pledge? "Trusting in God's help"—there is strength. "I solemnly promise"—not to be taken lightly. "To abstain from the use of all alcoholic liquors including wine, beer and cider"—Beer! Some one says, not root-beer, surely? Why not? A Y. P. B. boy of my town bought a bottle of root beer at a local drug store. He took it to the school chemist who analyzed it and found it contained five percent of alcohol! This was noised around considerably, but it is said that the druggist is still telling Y. P. B. members that root beer contains no alcohol. Cider! In nearly every Branch some say, "There isn't any harm in sweet cider," and want to cross out "cider" before signing the pledge. Let me recommend that leaflet, "What's the Harm in Cider?" published by our National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois. Then decide the question for yourself, but remember you are your brother's keeper.

A short time ago one of the boys in my school room was lamenting the fact that people were working for the passage of a law against individual fireworks on the Fourth. I said to the children, "Do you know that every year on the Fourth of July, there are many, many children killed and many more maimed for life as a result of fireworks? Wouldn't you be willing to give up a little fun for the sake of all those children?" Every one of the thirty-three children sympathetically answered, "Yes!" Wouldn't you be willing to give up even apple juice for the sake of others?

"From tobacco in every form"—Isn't it a privilege to associate with clean young men and women who have signed the triple pledge? "And from profanity"—"Y. P. B., you stand for all that's fine and true; I will pledge my youth and strength to stand by you, that the world a purer, better place may be, until Truth's white light dispels Earth's night, oh, Y. P. B."

Service is the third reason for signing the pledge. In every community there is the opportunity for lifting the standards of living, for creating public sentiment for law observance, for many branches of Americanization work—one of the most pressing and important needs of America today.

After taking such a vow, we are on our personal honor to keep that pledge. We have at stake, first, our own integrity; second, the reputation of the Young People's Branch in our community; third, the morale of the Branch. For no one can have energy and enthusiasm to work for an organization whose standards have been lowered before the community.

Lastly, what are the results of taking the pledge? Who can measure the results on the lives of the young people who have signed the triple pledge, and on the lives they may have touched?

Individuals make up the community, communities make up nations. Other nations are looking to the United States to successfully demonstrate the value of national prohibition. What part have we, as a Young People's Branch and as individual members in that Branch, in reaching the goal of World Prohibition in 1925?

An Australian, a Japanese, and a native of India were the winners in the Dow essay contest for foreign students in American colleges conducted by the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association. First prize was given to Oswald Goulter of the College of Missions, Indianapolis; second prize to Colbert N. Kurokawa of Dickinson College, Pa., and third honors were won by Miss Isabella Bux of De Pauw University, Indiana. The contest was open to all the 7,000 foreign students in America, and students from seventeen different nations entered essays. The prizes were given by Fred N. Dow, editor of the Portland (Me.) Express, and son of Neal Dow, famous prohibition leader of earlier days.

A Prohibition Public Speaking Contest for all the foreign students in American schools is announced by the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association for the early autumn. Local contests are to be held among the students of each nationality in an institution, and the winners of these local national contests are to compete at Toronto, Canada, during the week of Nov. 24-29, against similar winners of their own nationality from other institutions. Then the final winners of each nationality are to meet in a Grand International Contest, also at Toronto. The speeches are to be limited to some phase of alcoholism and may be read or delivered from memory. Prizes are offered for each step in the series. No Americans or Canadians are eligible.

Important Notice

Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary, asks us to announce that the Young People's Branches of Philadelphia have offered to entertain all active Y. P. B. members, boys or girls, for lodging and breakfast during the World's and National Convention in Philadelphia. All arrangements should be made through the state Y. P. B. secretary, Miss La Rue Chorpenning, Clearfield, Pa. She will notify Miss Marian W. McCorkle, 2129 N. 21st St., Philadelphia, who has the matter in charge. All Y. P. B. members who desire to take advantage of this offer and attend the great meetings should without delay order seats in the Academy of Music.

Prices per each seat are as follows:

Parquet	$3.00
Parquet Circle	2.00
Balcony, first two rows	2.00
Balcony, second and third rows	1.50
Box seat, main floor and balcony	4.00
Family Circle (third floor)	1.00

Checks should be made payable to and order sent to Leah Cobb Marion, Emporium, Pa.

The enthusiastic Y. P. B. of Dinuba, California, under the efficient leadership of Mrs. Lura R. Harness, is not relaxing its efforts during the summer, but through out-door meetings, combined with social affairs, is reaching many who could not be interested in any other way. A sunset meeting was recently held at Hayden Heights, and an attractive program carried out. On another evening the supervisor of the playgrounds very generously offered their use for a ball game, furnishing the balls and bats used by the boys and girls, who were pitted against each other. One very popular diversion is a swim, under proper chaperonage, followed by lunch and the regular meeting, often on the river's banks.

One thousand forty-four signatures were secured to the Polyglot Petition. It was handed to the principal of the Dinuba high school the day the high school cadets left for camp, and each one signed it. Practically every student in the school signed. The principal is deeply interested in the Y. P. B. and has promised his assistance next year.

The tipsy girl is hideous, writes Eleanor Glyn, noted novelist, in one of a series of letters to the flapper, telling her how to win and hold happiness, which have recently appeared in the Chicago Herald-Examiner. "Oh, Flappers," she pleads, "do band together to try and make it fashionable not to drink. That is the only way to stop it. If it were considered a ban on social rise to be drunk, and that you stamped yourself of the lowest class by being so, in a year the horror would all have disappeared. And you are youth, and you are hope!—and you are beauty and joy for the future!"

Who Wants Hootch?

"The most inveterate 'hootch hound' in the state, could he but see how the stuff he drinks is made, would swear off forever," says the Starkville (Miss.) News. "The average moonshine still is a place of indescribable dirt, filth and squalor." The moonshiner is chiefly concerned with getting his product made and marketed as quickly as possible. The scene around the average still is sickening. "The ground is nasty and sloppy, covered with old peach stones, potash, concentrated lye cans, regurgitated chewing tobacco, dirty flasks, carboys, fruit jars, old barrels—anything and everything—regardless of how it may have been originally used—that will hold liquor, and never even a casual washing before the hastily manufactured alcoholic drink is placed therein." Scores of samples of liquor taken from stills showed on chemical analysis that concentrated lye was used in the clarifying process.

According to the News, which had access to some of the written reports submitted to the Federal government by prohibition enforcement officers, describing the stills they had raided, at one place not far from Jackson a dead blacksnake, about six feet long, badly decomposed, was found in a barrel of mash from which the liquor had been withdrawn; at another still, where the barrel of mash was buried in the ground, a decayed bullfrog was found, floating on top.

At a still of large capacity the cap of the still was so filthy that it had been fly-blown and infested with maggots, and the liquor was being filtered through these.

It should be borne in mind that practically all the stills raided by prohibition officials are found in the open, generally in some low, dirty swamp, where all kinds of insects and flies abound, and, furthermore, that the moonshine is manufactured by men who are ignorant of the first laws of fermentation or the rules of sanitation. Their sole and only aim is to evolve something with a powerful kick in it, and they give never a thought to how dangerous or poisonous it may be.

Ohio's Educational Conference

Helen H. Green

Beautiful Lakeside, on the wooded banks of old Erie, was the scene of Ohio's Educational Conference again this year. State President Florence D. Richard has her summer home at this delightful resort and the state organization owns and maintains a roomy cottage for the comfort of its members.

State Corresponding Secretary Van Kirk presided over the five sessions of the conference; all except one of the state officers were present and on the program. The Hon. John F. Kramer gave his splendid address on "Democracy" at the evening session held in the great Lakeside auditorium, the other guests of honor being Miss Georgia Hopley, first woman national prohibition agent, and Miss Vera Adamson, our W. C. T. U. missionary to the Philippines. The organization felt justly proud of these "favorite sons and daughters," as it chances that all three are products of the Buckeye state.

County presidents from twenty or more counties reported active co-operation among dry forces, and much interest in enforcement of law. The Americanization Center in Cleveland and the Mother-Child Center in Toledo are flourishing testimonials of enterprise and success.

Politics, however, engaged much of the attention of the conference, as is natural considering that our primaries are to be held on August 8, and that Ohio is again to be the center of a terrific wet and dry struggle.

Members were advised by various speakers that their "primary duty" is of first importance, because, obviously, unless they help nominate strong, dry men they will not be able to vote for them at the November election. The entrance of women into politics has forced the so-called machines to head up their tickets with citizens of such character that the drys in Ohio are embarrassed by a multiplicity of acceptable candidates. For governor alone we have four dry Republicans and at least two dry Democrats.

If Ohio can send to Congress another Senator as dry as Frank B. Willis, elect a majority of its Congressmen from the dry candidates, put in one of the preferred men for governor and wring last year's wet spots from the general assembly, we shall feel that it wasn't for naught that Ohio was selected as the birthplace of both the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League.

W. C. T. U. officers have made a joint survey with the state Anti-Saloon League and as a result have recommended a full slate of dry candidates in both political parties. State Legislative Superintendent Lulu T. Gleason (who is herself a candidate for the general assembly), in a speech before the conference, reminded the women that the wets never disagree, but pull together for their strongest men, regardless of personal preference and prejudice.

The Dry Federation of Cleveland already has its ticket in the field and will furnish 75,000 sample ballots to churches and organizations, that all who run may read the names of recommended candidates and get them nominated.

C. C. Crabbe, author of the famous Crabbe Act and supporter of all dry, moral legislation in recent years, is a candidate for attorney-general, and the Ohio W. C. T. U. feels that he should have the support of all Christian voters, regardless of political affiliation.

Judge Florence E. Allen, who claims to be the first woman in the nation elected to the Common Pleas Court, is seeking by petition to be placed on the State Supreme Court bench. Judge Allen is a consistent member of our organization and is being supported by all the unions in the state. No woman in public life has been more universally pleasing to the women of Ohio.

Margaret Dye Ellis Honored

Elizabeth P. Gordon

It was a red-letter day for white ribboners summering at Mount Tabor, New Jersey, and residing at adjacent towns, when they gathered recently to do honor to our beloved Margaret Dye Ellis.

In spite of a severe thunder storm, a fine crowd of influential W. C. T. U. women assembled in "The Bethel" while the downpour of rain rattled relentlessly on the tin roof. Mrs. Ellis, seated in front of the group, smiled on the women, and obeying her beckoning gesture, they drew their chairs close to the platform, encircling her in loving and homelike fashion.

Devotional and white ribbon hymns were sung until the artillery of the heavens ceased. Mrs. Minnie Ellis Munroe, the gifted and devoted daughter of Mrs. Ellis, accompanied on the piano while Mrs. Warner of the Roseville (Newark) union, was the song leader.

Mrs. Clark of Newark, who ably presided, reminded her hearers of the significance of the rally, for it was at Mount Tabor that Mrs. Ellis gave her first W. C. T. U. address and during that year was elected New Jersey's state corresponding secretary. This position she occupied for thirteen years, building up the work during the most crucial period of its history. There was scarcely a Sunday that she did not speak in the churches two or three times.

In remembrance of this state service and of twenty-five years at Washington, D. C., where she was a most important factor in promoting national prohibition, the audience rose when Mrs. Ellis was introduced and gave her a rousing white ribbon cheer. In this atmosphere of loving appreciation it was easy for her to speak eloquently of "The Growth of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union." With much of her old-time vigor, and in musical voice and magnetic manner, she gave racy incidents of the work in New Jersey and Washington, and at the close of her address received beautiful flowers and an ovation.

The writer had the privilege of speaking along the line of our victories and telling from a national viewpoint of the appreciation of Mrs. Ellis' life work.

TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR DRY AGENTS ARE NOW BEING CONDUCTED IN DIFFERENT CITIES, for the purpose of teaching Federal prohibition agents the rudiments of obtaining evidence against law violators. This step was found necessary because of the failure of agents to properly prepare details of cases for court proceedings, of blunders in making arrests and in serving summonses without sufficient evidence upon which to prosecute.

SEVENTY-THREE PER CENT OF THE REPLIES SO FAR RECEIVED BY BUSINESS MEN OF SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES, AUSTRALIA, FROM BUSINESS MEN IN THE UNITED STATES, in response to a questionnaire bearing on prohibition, have been favorable to its continuance.

W. C. T. U. HISTORY IN THE MAKING

The Aurora (Ill.) W. C. T. U. is mindful of its future and devotes much time to work among children and young people. It recently held a reception for the high school graduates and their teachers, an annual affair, which is always greatly enjoyed. The union gave a picnic to its five companies of National Prohibition Guards, named respectively, Anna Gordon, Neal Dow, Theodore Roosevelt, Ella Boole and Helen Hood. Over forty children attended and were given a happy time with refreshments and games. The Aurora and the Central unions together "mother" a live, active Young People's Branch, with a membership of over forty, in charge of Mrs. S. B. Wright, the county president, assisted by Mrs. E. H. Guenther.

The W. C. T. U. of Rockford, Illinois, had a unique float in the State Christian Endeavor parade. Canopied, and beautifully draped with white bunting intertwined with green sprays, it was very impressive. Wearing a long, white robe and ribbons, Mrs. Florence Hageman stood statue-like in the float, one hand touching reverently a portrait of Frances Willard. Two young ladies sang, at intervals, as a duet, "All Round the World the Ribbon White Is Twined." An automobile filled with the officers of the W. C. T. U. followed the float. The W. C. T. U. pennants and mottoes, which were everywhere in evidence, were greeted with generous applause.

Central W. C. T. U. of Adrian, Michigan, recently surprised its president, Mrs. Lillian Shields, at her home, and presented to her a gift in appreciation of her three years of devoted service to the cause. A picnic supper was afterward enjoyed, followed by music. Mrs. Shields is to make her home in Indiana. The vice-president, Mrs. E. Darling, will carry on the work the remainder of the year.

The Coeur d'Alene (Idaho) W. C. T. U. is busily engaged in various lines of W. C. T. U. endeavor, with great emphasis on law enforcement. Members, and others who are interested, keep a close watch for bootleggers, who are promptly reported to the proper authorities. S. T. I. work has been carried on in the grade schools, and the public invited to hear the essays read. Ten dollars in prizes was awarded. The latest achievement, and one of which the union is very proud, is the organization of an L. T. L. of twenty members, the first in the state. A joint picnic was given on July 21 in honor of Miss Gordon's birthday. There are thirty-two little recruits to tread the path made safe for them, and through these children many of the mothers are becoming interested and it is hoped eventually to secure them as W. C. T. U. members. Over five hundred names have been secured for the Polyglot Petition.

Kansas Official Board Meeting Brings Out New Ideas for Service

Special Correspondence

Neither rain nor anything else, has the power to dampen the ardor of white ribboners, who are ever on the alert to make the most of every opportunity to create sentiment for the great cause of prohibition. Though it poured the entire time the Kansas official board, recently meeting in Goodland, was in session, the W. C. T. U. women in attendance were not in the least dismayed but "tended to business" with their accustomed thoroughness and zest. One delegate to reach the meeting, drove a hundred miles over roads that were indescribable.

This get-together affair was held with the thought in mind of giving the women who rarely have an opportunity to attend state conventions, the privilege of meeting the state officers and from them gaining new inspiration for the work just ahead.

It was the third meeting of the kind of the year and included many interesting features. A banquet, attended by eighty persons, took place the first evening, two classes of young people from the Sunday school of the church preparing and serving the supper. Following the feast, Mrs. Eva Morley Murphy, president of the local union, introduced the state vice-president, Mrs. Emma Grover, the corresponding secretary, Miss Mary E. Dobbs, the recording secretary, Mrs. Ida Walker, and the treasurer, Mrs. Lizzie K. Robinson, who spoke briefly. The state president, Mrs. Lillian M. Mitchner, was then introduced and after a few remarks presented Mrs. Margaret Ruff, who later was authorized by the official board to do field work until the time of the state convention. She spoke interestingly on "Why I Love the Work of the W. C. T. U."

Rev. M. R. Starbuck, pastor of the church, spoke enjoyably to the toast, "Our Captain." "Work for Enforcement" was sung with spirit. Addresses of welcome were made by Mr. J. J. Knight for the mayor, Mrs. J. C. McArthur, for the club women, and Prof. McArthur for the schools. Mrs. Grover, Miss Dobbs, Mrs. Walker and Mrs. Robinson responded. In the absence of Judge Sparks, Mr. E. F. Murphy gave an address on law enforcement.

Many interesting discussions took place during the meeting of the official board. In connection with the report of the missionary work at Pittsburg, Miss Dobbs told something of its history, speaking of the conditions in "Little Italy" which made it unsafe for an American person to visit that section before W. C. T. U. work was begun there. The W. C. T. U. has achieved a great deal in that part of the state among the foreign-born.

The state trio team honor roll was discussed and it was decided to publish in the state paper a local union honor-roll on which will be listed every union whose three officers, president, corresponding secretary, and treasurer, take THE UNION SIGNAL.

Mr. Fred Crabbe, state superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, assistant attorney general for the state, and state law enforcement commissioner, in an inspiring address related some of his experiences in ousting derelict officers, capturing whisky stills, and arresting bootleggers. Over forty-one officers have been deposed during the last twelve months. He pleaded that at the coming election men who can be depended upon be placed in office.

The various union presidents had suggestions to offer regarding the prosecution of the work along local union lines. One told of the method adopted by her W. C. T. U. of having the members who did not secure new members, entertain those who did. Another told of an entertainment her union gave for babies. The mothers became interested and wanted to join.

From All Around the World

Many never have had a chance to attend a WORLD'S CONVENTION OF THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION and never again will have such an opportunity. Therefore, we want every man, woman and child in the world to know that it meets in Philadelphia in November, 1922. Please do your part in reaching that last man—or he may be a schoolboy now, but soon he will be a man shaping the destiny of the future; he may not be able to go to Philadelphia this year, but he will look eagerly for news about the great convention in the daily papers if he has a sticker on the cover of that fascinating book which he is reading during vacation.

Only $2.00 for a thousand during the summer; $1.50 for five hundred, and fifty cents for one hundred and twenty-five stickers.

Please send remittance with order to

Personal Mention

To the president of the W. C. T. U. of Maine, Mrs. Althea G. Quimby, has come the honor of having conferred upon her by Bates College, at its commencement, the honorary degree of Master of Arts, "in recognition of the very helpful work you have been doing for temperance in the state of Maine." This came as a complete surprise to Mrs. Quimby, and aside from her personal pleasure, she is happy in the thought of the honor bestowed upon the organization.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life.

MRS. JANE D. H. MOORE, of Georgetown, Illinois, wife of Rev. George H. Moore, pastor of the Friends Church. When needed, she filled with great acceptability her husband's pulpit, being a duly appointed minister. Mrs. Moore was one of the most efficient workers in the local W. C. T. U. and was both local and county superintendent of Americanization, having under her supervision two classes of foreign-speaking people, who became greatly attached to her. None so lowly that she could not lend a helping hand; her broad sympathies went out to anyone in need. Her services as a speaker were greatly in demand for institutes and conventions and in whatever she undertook she was always faithful and successful. A consistent Christian, she was ever ready for the task next to be done for the furtherance of the kingdom. Many will deeply mourn the Home-going of this beloved comrade.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Bertram Harford, who becomes acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, the latter, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, a total abstainer, notes that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding they proceed to Seraneb. Fortescue constantly urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment. At Christmas time Angela's mother and stepfather come for a visit, and she learns that her own father died in the insane hospital, a victim of alcoholism, when she was a little child. Her mother pleads with Fortescue to shield Angela from the dangers of drink, but he treats the matter lightly. Accompanying her mother on a visit to the Zenana hospital in Seraneb, Angela is much attracted to the noble young missionary at its head, Dr. Kathleen Scott, but Fortescue forbids her to go again. Bertram Harford, who has been transferred to Seraneb, wounded, is taken to Dr. Scott's hospital. While convalescing he talks to the doctor, and finds they have much in common. Because of her ill health Fortescue sends Angela to Mussoorie, to Mrs. Carlyle, where she is easily led to take, first an alcoholized "medicine," and then the liquors offered by friends. Returning to Seraneb, she continues to drink, and wanders to Harford's bungalow one evening, after being turned out of the club, thus becoming a subject for gossip which her husband hears. He upbraids her, and she pours out her soul to Dr. Scott, who takes her to her hospital for treatment. Meanwhile, the friendship between Harford and Kathleen grows stronger. She accepts an invitation for a motor-car ride with him and while resting in the garden of a Mohammedan tomb, he tells her of his love and of his sad heritage. She writes to an American scientist for advice. Fortescue is taken dangerously ill and Angela goes to him at Naini Tal.)

CHAPTER XXVI.

A month passed and it wanted but a few days to the arrival of the expected mail from America.

"Dak (post) for Miss Sahiba," said the bearer, bringing a tray with several letters to her side as she sat by Angela.

Kathleen caught them up and ran to her room. Yes, there was the decisive document! Her heart stood still—her eyes darkened—her face flushed!

With trembling limbs, she sank into a chair and her fluttering fingers broke the seal. She unfolded the large thin sheet, but was unable to see the words for the mist of emotion which hung between her eyes and the paper. Her destiny! How much it meant! Union with the man she loved—or separation! No wonder that she found it hard to subdue the beating of her pulses, the rapid pressure of her young blood! Panting with emotion, at last she read these words:—

"I am much interested in the case about which you consult me. I have given it my best attention and have gone over the record of twenty years' practice among, and observation of, inebriates. I find no case where, the man being a lifelong abstainer, and the woman free from the alcohol taint, there has been transmitted inebriety. There is little risk, if any, in such a marriage!"

Kathleen covered her face and poured forth her paean of thanksgiving. Ah! what ecstasy filled every nerve with joy! Then came steps on the verandah and Harford's voice asking for her.

"I could not wait after I knew the mail was in. Has it come? Ah!" He breathed heavily, his heart beat with suffocating quickness, his iron nerves were all unstrung by the agony of his suspense.

Kathleen held out the letter, with love-light beaming from her eyes. "It is all right!" she whispered.

Instead of the letter, he took her to himself. Keeping his arm around her, he said brokenly, and she saw that his eyes were filled with tears, and his hands trembling, "The suspense and now the joy has unnerved me."

He caught and kissed her vigorously.

"You must be quiet," she laughed "and read this," and she thrust the letter into his hand.

He read it through, then looked up quickly.

"A little risk?" he asked, breathlessly

"Will you take it, Bertram?"

"No, no! You!" He could say no more

"I have taken it," she answered gravely.

"You give me so much," he answered humbly; then he added, "and your profession, Kathleen! It will be a sacrifice to become the wife of a Civil servant."

"No, no, dear! When a woman gives herself, all these lesser things are nothing!"

"Even to giving up your beloved hospital?"

"Yes, even that! But I shall be a medical missionary to the end!"

"Dearest, you know I rejoice in your gifts. How could I marry a woman whose time was divided between dressmaker and bridge, varied by petty intrigues

Incidents Related By the Americanization Worker

Clara Ansorge Fuller

The house-to-house teacher had spent a pleasant lesson time with Mrs. Italia. Looking up at the clock suddenly, she discovered that the hour was later than she had thought. The startled look in her face did not escape her pupil, who hastened to explain, as she pointed to the time piece: "He walk too queek."

Three Japanese women visited were intensely interested to learn and struggled valiantly with the simple lesson. The teacher asked, as a test, "Where is the clock?" The blank looks on the faces of the pupils showed that "clock" was not in their vocabulary. "Tick, tick, tick," said the teacher, "Br-r-r-r-r." They laughingly brought out the desired article.

A big, strong Italian woman, who had had some educational advantages in her native land, and was very much ashamed of her ignorance of English, was unable to attend the classes, because of her four small children, and so a house-to-house teacher was sent to her. At first, she appeared totally unable to make herself understood in English, but as she became acquainted, it was apparent that she understood what was being said. She was also able to read a little in the daily papers. Therein was some discussion on divorce, and she read the headlines aloud to the teacher, saying most forcefully: "Me no divorce, me fight."

The Enemy

"And how could I marry a man with big racing debts and long drink bills?"

They laughed with lightness of heart.

"We are good comrades as well as lovers," said Kathleen; "and you won't ask me to obey, will you?"

He turned a caressing glance upon her, their hands met, they understood each other.

They were a fine, healthy couple, ready for the strain and stress of life. He, tall, stalwart, intellectual—she, womanly, strong in character, warm-hearted, with a face delicate and sympathetic, the medium of her radiant soul.

"Here is another letter for you, Kathleen," said Harford, handing her a thick sheet of paper. "It is from Divan Singh—he wants to enter my service."

"He is a good man, and you would do well to engage him. Let me see what he says." She read,

"Honorary Sir,

"My Sahib is dead, my Mem Sahiba go across the sea, I much want to be servant, to serve a Christian Sahib, who not drink Sharab. I am much obliged forever if in future your Presence will do good for me. I pray for your Honor's longevity, and will pour warm water on all works done by you. With salaams,

"Your slave,

"Divan Singh."

They laughed, and Harford asked, "What does the 'warm water' mean?"

"Oh! he means that he will aid and abet all your good works—the opposite of 'throwing cold water on you'—the 'wet blanket,' you know!"

"A real 'baboo' letter! Well, I think he will do for our new menage. Eh! Kathleen?"

She smiled, and nodded her head brightly. What a fascinating sound that "our" had for her!

The same mail brought good news to Angela:—her mother would be with her by the next P. and O. boat. The joy seemed to give her fresh strength. The prospect of returning to live in America under her mother's care, gave a new incentive towards recovery. She now wanted to get well, and talked of the time when she and baby would have said good-bye to India. Kathleen alone knew the state of Angela's heart. She dreaded even the meeting, for she realized the danger of any strong emotion of joy or sorrow. But mother and daughter met, and Kathleen's apprehensions were happily averted. Angela nestled into her mother's arms with the words, "I, too, am a mother—I know," and rested in perfect comfort in the love which had been hers from the beginning of her life and would be hers until the end.

Baby was brought to his grandmother, who admired his bonnie fair hair and pink and white complexion. A spring of tenderness welled up in Mrs. Mortimer's heart for the little fellow. She, however, expressed astonishment that he could not walk or talk, for he was now fifteen months old.

Angela assured her that he was getting on wonderfully, considering his delicate state at birth.

Preparations were begun for the return to America. Angela took deep interest in each detail. Kathleen said nothing, but every day as it passed confirmed her in her forebodings.

One morning Angela awoke with a feeling of lassitude, positively oppressive in its intensity, and a headache, as if hot lead were pressing on the back of her eyes. She asked for her mother, but was told that she was out with Miss Doctor Sahiba for her early morning walk.

"Carry me into the verandah; perhaps the air will revive me."

She was placed on a long couch and lay enjoying the fresh air, tempered by the warm sunshine. Bees hummed around her, and the scent of honeysuckle stole in.

Suddenly steps were heard returning,—then voices. Mother and Kathleen were coming.

They were talking earnestly; she caught the words, "child"—"intellect," and then they came close and stood outside, to finish their conversation, unaware of her presence and unable to see her through the thickly hanging vines which draped the verandah. She heard her mother say, "Tell me your opinion frankly, Dr. Scott."

Then came the reply.

"Drink, you know, is responsible! It is computed that half a million idiots are born of drunken parents annually."

"You think the boy is an idiot?"

"I fear so."

Angela sprang up—there issued from her lips a choking, gasping sound; the poor, overstrained heart, driven and destroyed by alcohol, gave way suddenly. The emaciated figure fell back,—quite still!

They found her dead. They buried her at sunset.

As Harford and Kathleen stood looking down on the white-robed body ready for burial, strewn with violets, the hands clasped on the breast, the worn face peacefully smiling, Harford said, "Another victim of the enemy!"

"More sinned against than sinning! And we, with all our efforts to help her, were defeated!"

Mrs. Mortimer, with the boy in her arms, came in, and stood looking down at all that was left of her only child.

"And yet another victim!—'unto the third generation'!" she whispered hoarsely, pointing to the child.

Kathleen fell on her knees and prayed, in broken accents: "Oh God! accept our lives—make use of us—to arrest the onward march of this Enemy—of our homes—of Thy Kingdom!"

A woman in a Connecticut town suffered many years living with an intemperate husband who abused and neglected her. Finally he died, and she bought a large tombstone to place at his grave, and upon it had carved these words: "Vote No License."

Three Big Reasons Why Every Member of the W. C. T. U. Should Have the Union Signal Up to Election Day

Of course every member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union ought to have the regular weekly UNION SIGNAL all the time, but there are certain very special reasons why it will be indispensable to her up to the fall election, November 7.

Peruse, Ponder and Pass on These Reasons

No. 1.—THE UNION SIGNAL will have each week authentic information as to the plans and activities of the opponents of prohibition, their efforts to prevent the enforcement of the law, to make people believe prohibition is a failure and create sentiment and secure votes for a prowine and beer Congress.

No. 2.—THE UNION SIGNAL will have each week a page or more of evidence of the benefits of prohibition, that can be used to convert the sceptic who does not yet realize the value of the law.

No. 3.—THE UNION SIGNAL will tell what the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing and can do to defeat the efforts of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, and to insure the election November 7 of a dry Congress.

ENDEAVOR TO GET EVERY MEMBER OF YOUR LOCAL UNION TO TAKE THE UNION SIGNAL.

Patriotic Motion Song

Union Signal Quiz

1. Tell some of the plans of the opponents of prohibition for nullifying the prohibitory law.
2. What has Dr. W. A. Evans to say of beer and hot weather.
3. Relate the latest chapter of the history of the W. C. T. U. of Argentina.
4. Why is the situation in that country especially encouraging.
5. Can you tell how much it costs a woman to live in your town?
6. What is the attitude of railroad officials toward prohibition?
7. If Abraham Lincoln wasn't the author of the anti-prohibition proclamation credited to him by the wets, who was?
8. Suggest methods being used by certain states for keeping up interest in the membership campaign.
9. Judging by answers received to a recent questionnaire sent to college presidents, what proportion favor prohibition?
10. Name three reasons why every member of the W. C. T. U. should have THE UNION SIGNAL!

NEW JERSEY IS SWINGING INTO THE DRY LINE WITH A VENGEANCE, judging by many signs. The latest comes in the shape of an editorial in the Morristown Jerseyman of May 16, in which notice is served that if bootlegging and rum peddling in that city do not cease, the columns of the paper will be used to acquaint the public with conditions, and "there will be a cleaning out of officials by a power of righteousness which some officeholders never dreamed exists."

STRICT ENFORCEMENT OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT AND THE VOLSTEAD ACT is reported to be the chief plank in the platform of Miss Eleanor Miller, candidate for the California assembly from the 67th district, the city of Pasadena. And listen: A reporter for the San Francisco Examiner expresses the hope that more women will get into the law-making body at Sacramento. "I used to think they'd be a nuisance," he says, "but the women we've had there average higher in honesty, intelligence and industry than the men. To be sure, they vote bone dry, and I'm a wet; but when they vote bone dry they do so because they honestly believe bone dry."

And then—no more.
But once—and then, the Silent Door
Swings on its hinges—
Opens * * * closes—
And no more I pass this way.
With all my might
I will essay
Sweet comfort and delight
To all I meet upon the Pilgrim Way.
For no man travels twice
The Great Highway
That climbs through Darkness up to light—
Through Night
To Day.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

"NO MORE WAR" DEMONSTRATION IN UNITED STATES CAPITAL—STATUS OF BILL TO CARRY ON WORK OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL SOCIAL HYGIENE BOARD—WOMEN ATTORNEYS WINNING HIGH PLACES

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Today a "No More War" banner was raised at the headquarters of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, Washington, D. C., by representatives of the national organizations belonging to the Council.

The banner shows the words "No More War" set in an unbroken circle of the flags of all nations, and symbolizes "national identity within world unity."

Following the flag raising ceremonies, a committee of War Mothers, led by Mrs. Joseph Phillips, president of the District War Mothers, drove to Arlington and placed a "No More War" wreath on the grave of the Unknown Soldier, with the inscription, "In Honor of the Sons of the Women of Today; in Pledge to the Sons of the Women of the Future." "No More War" placards bearing the same inscription were placed early this morning at the foot of the memorial trees on 16th Street.

The hope that the United States would call an international economic conference in the near future, and that all nations would turn their efforts to devising a method for the outlawry of war, was expressed at the flag raising exercises by S. E. Nicholson, Associate Secretary of the National Council, who said in part:

"Statesmen cannot ignore the fact that the people of the world want war done away with. President Harding, when he said 'Our hundred millions want less of armaments and none of war,' and summoned the statesmen of the world together to do what they could to prevent war, challenged all other groups of citizens to do their part in this world effort to establish peace.

"The world is organizing against war with a thoroughness almost equal to that with which it organized for war. In response to the call for today's demonstration we have distributed half a million posters to forty states. It is safe to say that a million people will take part in the demonstration in this country alone, while throughout the world there will be many times that number. A movement of millions of people cannot fail.

"Nations have always thought in terms of war, and in case of international stress it has seemed easier to turn to war than it has been to find the substitute for war. Let the nations begin to think in terms of peace, and the peaceful methods of settlement are bound to suggest themselves with practical effect. They are the truest patriots and will serve their country best who help to rid the world of war."

Status of Bill to Carry on Work for the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board

It has already been stated in these columns (see Washington Letter of July 6) that Congress failed to make appropriations for the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, the Federal agency for fighting vice and reducing social diseases in the Army and Navy, and the board, therefore, is not functioning at the present time for lack of funds.

In September, 1921, in view of the assurance that the activities of the board would be provided for in the proposed Department of Public Welfare the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board voted that no appropriations be asked for the board as an independent agency next year.

In March, 1922, the board voted to request the transfer of its activities to the Department of Justice. This was in accord with the conclusion that the legislative situation was not such that it seemed probable the proposed Department of Public Welfare would come into existence before the end of the present fiscal year. Bills were prepared to effect the proposed transfer and introduced in the House by Representative Kahn, of California (H. R. 11490), and in the Senate by Senator Wesley L. Jones, of Washington (S. 3544). The bills were referred to Judiciary committees.

A hearing was held June 6, before the Judiciary Committee of the House. Specialists prepared arguments in favor of the Kahn bill, and the presentation was most able. Twice Chairman Volstead called meetings of the committee, but each time the question of no quorum was raised, and no action, therefore, has been taken by the committee. Consideration of the bill began shortly before the recess of the House, which made quorums in committees doubtful. The subcommittee of the Woman's Joint Congressional Committee, directing the campaign for the continuance of this work, hopes for favorable action by the Congress on the Kahn-Jones bill, but we can not hope for this unless the women of the country express deep interest in this board, which has to its credit the repression or suppression of the activities of eighty-three vice districts. At the height of its activities the rate for social diseases was the lowest the Army has ever seen.

The House Judiciary Committee is given here:

Andrew J. Volstead, of Minnesota.
George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania.
Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri.
Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts.
C. Frank Reavis, of Nebraska.

Women Attorneys Winning High Places

That woman also has attained her place in the legal profession is reflected in the fact that in addition to Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, seven other women attorneys are attached to the Department of Justice as assistants.

Mrs. L. H. Wardell, of Ohio, is a special assistant in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in Washington, while Miss M. P. McCall is special assistant to District Attorney Peyton Gordon, of the District of Columbia. In New York, Miss Susan Brandeis, daughter of Justice Brandeis of the United States Supreme Court, is a special assistant to the district attorney.

No court in the land is barred to the woman lawyer, as evidenced by the number who have been admitted to practice before the United States Supreme Court. According to the National Women Lawyers' Association, there are approximately a thousand practicing women attorneys in the United States. And a fourth of these are on the register of the Supreme Court.

Mrs. Willebrandt represented the government in five important cases argued before the Supreme Court at the present term. And when the high court justices got around to deciding four of them, they took her view of the argument. Decision in the fifth case has not been handed down.

During the term of the Supreme Court fourteen women have been admitted to practice before it. The first of these was Mrs. Willebrandt, on the first day of the term, October 3. She was introduced by Attorney-General Daugherty.

Before a woman (or a man either) can appear before the Supreme Court she must have established herself in the profession. The Supreme Court rule requires three years' practice before the supreme court of the attorney's home state, and admission to the district Federal court in which the attorney resides. The Federal district court requires state supreme court status for admission. In some states women have not been practicing law for three years or there probably would be more on the register at the Capitol.

"Forget you are a woman and remember you are a lawyer," is the advice of Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, to those modern Portias who will be receiving law school diplomas this month, and to the thousand American women who already have been admitted to the bar. She adds:

"The success of the woman lawyer is not a question of sex at all. It is a question of her fitness, learning and industry. The men attorneys show the very finest spirit toward the women members of the bar. True at first there was antagonism and opposition that had to be overcome before women were permitted to practice law, and some bitter fights had to be waged before state legislatures, but that has all passed. The greatest danger the woman lawyer now faces is that too much limelight may spoil her success."

Legislative Headquarters, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., July 29, 1922.

METHODS OF ANTI-PROHIBITION ORGANIZATION CONDEMNED BY PROMINENT NEW YORK CLUB WOMEN

The methods adopted by the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment to enroll in its ranks society and club women are severely criticised by Miss Mary Garrett Hay, chairman of the New York City League of Women Voters, and other prominent suffrage and club leaders. In the name of a "committee" upon which are listed well known New York women, invitations are extended to sign an enrollment card and give support to the anti-prohibition movement, says the Christian Science Monitor.

"At least one of the women on the anti-prohibition committee is in Europe and several others are known to be at their country homes," said Miss Hay. "With a number of the women most prominently featured on the anti-prohibition committee absent from the city, it would be interesting to know what forces are carrying on the campaign in their name."

Miss Hay declared that the methods being used to enroll women in the anti-prohibition ranks are indicative of the subtle underground campaign which is being waged everywhere by those who would overthrow the Volstead Act.

She continued:

"I deeply resent the attempt to trick women by such methods. It is all a part of an insidious campaign to overthrow law and order and I hope that all intelligent women will so recognize it.

"Of all the means which have been exerted to entrap women, the most contemptible is to misquote the attitude of organizations. The fact that the New York City League of Women Voters has been publicly stated as opposing the Volstead Act is outrageous. The League has repeatedly and openly declared itself in favor of enforcement of the prohibition law. We are now preparing a questionnaire to be submitted to every candidate for Congress. Our questions will be so worded as to require an unequivocal statement on the dry issue from every Congressional candidate."

It is said the League will require answers to all questions and will post these answers at its headquarters in New York City. It is expected to hold a series of meetings in the various districts of the city, at which each candidate will state his attitude, or the answers will be read from his questionnaire. Prior to election day copies of the answers given in these questionnaires will be sent out to thousands of members of the League.

"Majority of Women Approve Prohibition," Admits Anti

The Monitor interviewed several prominent club women who had declined to serve on the committee of the Anti-Prohibition Association, and they were very frank in telling the reporter why they said "No, thank you."

"I deplore the attempt to introduce the wet issue in the women's clubs," said Mrs. Harry Lilly, a past president of the New York Federation of Women's Clubs, and now director for the first judicial district of the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs. "Most of the clubs are on record for the prohibition Amendment and its enforcement and I do not see how a mother could fail to give her earnest support to the dry campaign." Other prominent women express with equal fervor their disapproval of the anti-prohibition organization.

Colonel Ransom H. Gillett, general counsel and official in charge of the New York division of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, is said by the Monitor to have admitted, during a talk at a midday meeting conducted by the women's committee a few days ago: "I do not deny that the majority of women approve prohibition." His statement was strikingly sustained by many of the hundred or more persons present who were appealed to by Colonel Gillett to enroll as members.

"Simply No Work To Do"

"We are not closed in the sense of having discontinued doing the work; there is simply no work to do," remarked James M. Marden, director of the Walter Baker Sanitarium, Roxbury, Boston, to a newspaper reporter. The fact is that after thirty years of treating inebriate and narcotic cases, this sanitarium has virtually closed out its business, as there is not at present a single case on its books, and papers have been passed for the sale of the property, according to the Newton (Mass.) Circuit.

"The condition which we face is not confined to this sanitarium alone, but has become general throughout the country, many institutions such as this having been forced to close," said the director. "While there are other contributing causes, I am certain that prohibition has been the main factor in bringing about this situation. We have not had a single real alcoholic case to handle this year, and the number of such cases began to fall off almost immediately after prohibition. It is said that closing the saloons would be the cause of many men beginning the use of narcotics," he went on. "I have yet to hear of the first case induced by the closing of the saloon."

Dry Law Prevents Distress During Industrial Depression

That much suffering was prevented in Philadelphia during the period of industrial depression because of prohibition is one of the assertions in a statement just issued by the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity, covering its work from October 1, 1920, to December 31, 1921, as published in the Philadelphia North American.

"Whatever the effectiveness of the enforcement of prohibition may have been in the city as a whole, certainly prohibition has been of vast benefit to people of small incomes," reads the assertion. "There is no doubt that the ill effects of the industrial depression would have been much greater had there been no prohibition.'"

British Churchmen In National Campaign Against The Drink Traffic

At a meeting of the Temperance Council of the Christian Churches of England, held recently in London, it was decided to inaugurate a campaign to begin next fall and continue until they have secured what they want. It was indicated very clearly what is wanted. The members said they were not at all satisfied with conditions as they are at present, with a drink bill of £400,000,000 and no good resulting to the people who paid the money. For the purpose of the campaign, they are working for four objectives: Sunday closing; the abolition of sale to young persons; the control of clubs; and local option. All the program is based on local option, following the example of Canada and the United States in the beginning of the prohibition movement.

The Bishop of London, chairman of the meeting, said that ten bishops were present, and in his tour of the country he had found that thirty bishops were teetotalers. He said a deputation from the Council had waited on the Prime Minister and told Mr. Lloyd George that they had taken off their coats in preparation for this task. The Prime Minister replied that if they had done that, nothing could keep them from succeeding. The Bishop said they were going to take the Prime Minister at his word.

A VOTE IN THE BALLOT BOX AT THE PRIMARIES AND ELECTION IS WHAT COUNTS

Moral issues are sometimes defeated by the failure of good citizens to vote. Stress "ballot box responsibility" from now until Election Day, November 7.

Congressional Debate By Radio

"The proposition of Representative Vincent Brennan, of Ohio, to equip the United States Capitol with a radio 'broadcaster' capable of carrying the House and Senate debates to all parts of the country so that the 'peepul' can know what is going on every day in Congress, is causing something akin to alarm in wireless circles," says The Washington Post. "Already the question is asked as to what the ether waves have ever done to Congress to be inflicted with such a daily output of oratory? And what chance would the air have to carry anything else once it was freighted with the Congressional debates?

"The problems which arise in connection with the project are simply stupendous. How could the Senate and House both be in wireless operation at the same time without serious 'interference?' Certainly it would be necessary to pitch the debates on different planes—different wave lengths. And which would claim the higher plane? Furthermore, if all the debates were being broadcasted, and some several hundred thousands of persons were listening spellbound at the old family fireside, how could you ever get either Representative or Senator to stop talking? Congress would be in session for twenty-four hours a day.

"Certainly the wireless telephone has Congressional possibilities, but if there has been too much talk, with only the Congressional Record as a medium of complete expression, what in the world would happen with a lot of radio sets tuned to concert pitch and rearin' to go?"

LEADING AMERICAN WOMEN EXTOL PROHIBITION

Jail Population Lessened by Prohibition

Maud Ballington Booth

I am naturally very strongly in favor of prohibition. I look upon it as an act of protection. But it is a fact that people constantly break the law and that many still drink.

When traveling in California last winter, I went by automobile through some of those wonderful mountain roads. All along the precipice there were railings painted white which gave us a great sense of protection and indicated the direction of the many dangerous curves. Some have broken through the railing and gone down the cliffs. I saw one reckless driver do this, but the many who are willing to drive carefully are very thankful for that protecting rail. I think that is something like prohibition.

My work lies chiefly in the prisons. It is there that I see the difference. I have been told by a number of our wardens that prohibition has cut down the number of arrests. I think, also, that our jail population has been lessened. Of course on the other hand we are getting a number of people who are arrested for violation of the code. I am positive from my experience in the homes of the poor that prohibition will promote health, prosperity and the happiness of the family.

I cannot conceive that there is any truth in the statement that the women of this country will demand a repeal of prohibition laws.

It seems to me that we cannot look for the full measure of success until we have had years of experience in its enforcement. After centuries of free drink and open saloons how can we expect to make our country dry in a few years? I fully believe that it will take a generation to prove the wisdom and power of prohibition.

Help Law Observance by Writing to the Newspapers

Katherine Devereaux Blake, Educator and Writer

The worst thing about the present lack of enforcement of the prohibition law is that the law-breakers are mainly among those who should be most careful to obey the law. One has only to look at the joke columns in our newspapers to realize that the wets are busy in every direction trying to discredit the law of the land. The best way to discredit any bad law is to enforce it absolutely. The wets know that real enforcement of this law would prove its beneficence. It is only a bad law that is injured by enforcement.

Two things made the prohibition law possible: First, the tireless work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and, above all, its success in obtaining the laws which made it necessary for the schools to teach the evil effects of alcohol and tobacco. There is danger that with prohibition there may be a certain laxity in carrying out the provisions of this law, and I would advise the members of the W. C. T. U., and women everywhere, to make certain that the children are being taught the evil effects of alcohol and tobacco.

Everyone who is interested in the enforcement of this law should answer the articles that are being continuously written, and in all probability paid for by the brewers and distillers. The most recent article that has come under my observation deals with the effects of alcoholism upon guinea pigs. No stress is laid upon the fact that alcohol is so deadly a poison that they simply could not feed it to the guinea pigs or they would die, but they put them in tanks where they were subjected to the fumes of alcohol, and even the smell of this poison had so disastrous an effect that the offspring of these alcoholized guinea pigs were feeble, and a goodly percentage of them died. The fact was emphasized that the third generation was stronger than those of guinea pigs that had not been alcoholized. No mention was made of the weaklings who had died without offspring in this third generation. Those members of this third generation which were stronger than similar litters of non-alcoholized guinea pigs were so, because they were an extreme exhibit of the survival of the fittest. Only the most robust guinea pigs could survive the alcoholization of their parents, or grandparents. To my mind, the whole experiment with the guinea pigs merely proves the deadliness and danger of alcohol.

Let me say again that answers should be written to the editors of all papers publishing articles in favor of the wets. Nothing influences an editor so much as letters from readers objecting to, or favoring, the contents of his newspaper. The ordinary layman does not realize how powerful such letters are. My last word is—write letters to the newspapers, protesting against the publication of wet sentiment.

Suffering Reduced During Unemployment Period

Florence Kelly, of the National Consumers League

In spite of the inevitable local difficulties of enforcement, I have reason to believe that the suffering accompanying the period of unemployment was immensely reduced by the absence of both drunkenness and of moderate drinking in the families where there was unemployment.

Among the nurses who care for the sick poor in their homes, the testimony is uniform that preparation for confinement was more adequate and ability to pay a moderate sum for nursing care was far more widespread than ever before.

It cannot, of course, be definitely proved (by statistics and individual records) that tuberculosis has diminished because of prohibition, but the fall in the tuberculosis death rate since prohibition took effect is certainly a striking and suggestive coincidence, and taken in connection with the reports of the nurses, is most encouraging.

I have lived for twenty-three years at the Henry Street Settlement, in the lower East Side of New York, among the needle-trade workers, and the office workers. My home, the Settlement, is the center of the nursing service. So what I say of their observations is first-hand news from the lowest levels of honest, self-respecting poverty.

Teachers in the public schools in the working class districts tell me that they are far less often called upon to buy or beg shoes for the pupils whose fathers are living. Widows have pensions. It was the children whose fathers drank who used to have to be clothed by the help of the teachers.

Finally, judges of the juvenile courts have told me, on my travels in the service of the National Consumers League, that they used to dread opening court on Monday morning because of the "unfit" guardian cases that they knew awaited them; now such cases are immeasurably fewer.

Let Women Use the Ballot to Hold and Enforce the Law

Frances E. Burns, Great Commander Ladies of the Maccabees

For thirty years I have been working with a group of 60,000 women, and necessarily I have come in close contact with the home and its environment and have seen the difficulties many women meet in connection with the drink problem. Everywhere women are expressing to me the gratifying change which has resulted since the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment, and stating that for the first time in many years the wages of the head of the family are used for the benefit of the home and family instead of being spent in the saloon. Repeatedly women say to me, "My husband is a different man since we have prohibition." Since my experience has not been local, but has covered the entire United States, I have come to know that the greatest possible benefit has resulted from the national prohibitory law.

A great task remains for the women, in that they must bring their ballots and their moral force to bear upon bootlegging and the illegal use of malted liquors. It is said that many children of Kansas have never seen a saloon. I believe that educational processes must begin at the present time and with the children, the men and women of tomorrow, who should be taught that law must be obeyed in all its forms—a rule made which should be universal for rich and poor, for the workers or the idlers, and which shall be for the best interests of all the people.

I believe that if the mothers and leaders would make a careful study of the city ordinances, and present them to the children in simple language easily understood, they would become interested and would soon learn to obey the laws as they do a school rule—instinctively and without thought of disobedience. Let this be followed by a primer page of some of the main state laws from the state constitution, and again of national laws, and, for the older children, of the National Constitution. We have today too few Constitutionalists, and too little thought is given to the basic laws of the state and nation.

You may rest assured that anything that can be done in these directions by the Ladies of the Maccabees will not be overlooked. Today, in our great co-operative meetings, we are stressing real Americanization, what prohibition has meant to the country, and the manner of using the ballot for the benefit of the home and protection of the children of the land, and this work will be consistently carried forward at all times. Let us radiograph to the farthest parts of the world the great good that has already come to the home, not forgetting the big task that is yet before us.

TELLING TESTIMONY TO VALUE OF PROHIBITION

FROM A GOVERNOR, A JUDGE, LABOR LEADER, HEAD OF FARM ORGANIZATION AND EMPLOYERS

Give the Prohibition Law a Chance

Jeremiah Neterer, U. S. District Judge, Seattle, Washington

I think the language of Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Crowley vs. Christensen, 137 U. S. Reports, 91, expresses my sentiments:

"By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community, there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dram shop, where intoxicating liquors, in small quantities, to be drunk at the time, are sold indiscriminately to all parties applying. The statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than any other source."

The state of Washington had a prohibition law before the National Prohibition Act, and the people here can testify to the great benefits which prohibition inspired. Savings banks deposits, statistics with relation to crime, and institutions and homes for indigent persons all speak volumes in favor of prohibition.

The best way to promote sentiment for the prohibition, or for any law, is to enforce it. The beneficence of the law is made apparent by enforcement. General Grant is quoted as saying, "The best way to repeal a bad law is to enforce it." If the law is bad it should be repealed, if it is good it should be enforced, and the only way to determine whether it is good or bad is to strictly enforce it, and I am satisfied that when the prohibition law is enforced no person having the welfare of the country at heart would want it repealed.

Organized Labor in Washington Convinced by Prohibition Demonstration

James A. Duncan, Secretary of Central Labor Council, Seattle, Washington

While there are some in our ranks who would gladly see the Eighteenth Amendment nullified, nevertheless, I feel safe in saying that the workers generally, and particularly the organized workers, recognize and appreciate the true value of prohibition.

While there was a good healthy minority opposed to prohibition before it came into effect in the state of Washington, it took but a short time of operation under the law to convince the organized workers generally of its great value. Even in times of strikes, unions were forced to a recognition of the vast improvement in the morale of the membership over that in like situations when booze was flowing freely. Under prohibition, the ranks of the strikers were much more secure and affairs were conducted with far less strife inside and outside of the union ranks.

The general standards in our organizations were raised very materially as the result of the coming of prohibition and longshoremen and other like organizations' delegates reported repeatedly that members who formerly were satisfied to stroll the streets in overalls are now dressing in such a way that they can not be easily distinguished from bankers, or other citizens.

While there are a number of lawless individuals who would be glad to see the return of the wet days, nevertheless, I am confident that if the decision were left to labor, Washington would never again go wet. As it is, the citizenship generally, knowing the full value of prohibition to this state, will take no chances on any modification of the law, and regardless of the action of other states, I am confident will see to it that Washington will continue in the dry column.

Farm Organizations for Prohibition

In response to an inquiry sent to the National Board of Farm Organizations, asking the position of the farm organizations of the country relative to the national prohibition law, C. S. Barrett, chairman of that organization, resident at Washington, D. C., says:

"Most of the farm organizations have taken no official position on this question, but the majority are undoubtedly in favor of national prohibition."

Effects of Prohibition on the Lumber Industry

Caroline R. Swope, Thorp, Washington

Thirty-five years ago I bade adieu to my mother and father, and my small brothers and sisters, to become the wife of a young logger and lumberman of Wisconsin. In my new home (a logging camp during the winter with the thrilling log drive in the spring), as mistress of a sawmill boarding-house, things were very new and strange to me. Often I would not see another woman for four or six months. I learned enough about timber, logs and lumber to make me a veritable "lumber jack." I grew to know much about the men and the evils besetting them, the traps laid for their unwary steps, and many of their problems were almost my own.

On pay-day, with liquor available, life was little less than a nightmare in that camp.

I do not think it is possible for one unfamiliar with conditions under license to realize what a saloonless America, made so by the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, means to the lumber industry, employers and employes. In the last few weeks I have asked both of them this question: "What are the effects of prohibition?" This reply came from a lumber dealer and factory man of thirty years' experience:

"Our men, boys and girls come to their work more regularly, have become better educated, are more faithful and reliable, and every man is back at his job after pay-day, SOBER. Their improvement in physical condition can hardly be expressed. Money that formerly went to the saloon is now used for the home and to buy family comforts. Fathers now realize they are fathers and spend their spare time with their children. My men nearly all have cars and enjoy life. Yes, business is decidedly better than before we had prohibition." (This man lives in Pierce county, Washington, where the school children last year wrote 17,000 essays on subjects suggested by the W. C. T. U.)

Another man of ten years' experience in the business says: "It is bad, of course, to have 'white mule' and bootleg stuff but men know when they come to work under the influence of liquor that it is a dead give-away for them. They do not come to my place drunk. Prohibition for me and my men."

Others assert that women and children are better fed and clothed, families own their own homes, and the workmen have farms. "Men are healthier and more regular at their work, wives and families are looked after better, and life in general is much more tolerable for the men in the logging and lumber business than in the old days. I believe our men, as well as we, appreciate the improved conditions." This from still another.

Dry Law Counted a Success in West Virginia

Governor E. F. Morgan of West Virginia

Prohibition has been successful in West Virginia. Adopted as an amendment to the state constitution in 1912 by a majority that greatly exceeded popular expectations, prohibition became a reality on July 1, 1914, and during the time that has elapsed it has had a sufficient opportunity to demonstrate its success.

Prohibition has not been wholly successful in preventing drunkenness or in wiping clean the police court blotters in our municipalities; it has not been one hundred per cent successful in reducing crime to a minimum, and it has not prevented some of our citizens from engaging in the illicit sale and manufacture of intoxicants. But in every division where there has been a determined stand to enforce the prohibition law, violations have been reduced to a minimum.

Admitting temporary inabilities of enforcement resulting from laxity of those in official places, prohibition has been successful in wiping out the economic losses that were formerly resultant from the operation of open saloons; it has made the purveyor of intoxicating liquors, who formerly sold in the open, a criminal and an outlaw; it has dislodged the habitué of the saloon and forced him to purchase his strong drink in violation of the statutes; it has brought the employer to the realization that labor is more effective without intoxicating liquors; it has convinced the employe that his personal fortunes are more secure without liquor; it has been responsible for the restoration of thousands of happy homes where contentment and happiness were denied while the open saloon offered solace and misdirected pleasure to the heads of families; it has resulted in the reclamation of many men who were unable to resist temptation; it has pulled many wives from their washtubs and restored their self-respect, and it has placed happy children in schools and given them an opportunity to develop their stunted minds and wasted bodies.

Notwithstanding the many violations of the prohibition laws, any statute that has accomplished so much in the interest of the general welfare, without injury to others, must be counted a success.

INTELLIGENT CITIZENSHIP ONE OF THE DOMINANT NOTES AT NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION MEETING

Cora Frances Stoddard, National Director, Scientific Temperance Investigation

Twelve thousand educators from all parts of the United States were the guests of Boston for a week at the aunual meeting of the National Education Association. Nearly a hundred meetings, some five hundred addresses, participation by many other speakers in iuformal discussions, gave rich opportunity for the study of ideals of the men and women who are helping the home to shape the America and the world of tomorrow.

It was fitting that the dominant note of the program should be, "The Democratic Awakening," as expressed in the "new world outlook" which it presents; its "promotion of progress toward realization of early American ideals;" its requirements: as "intelligent citizenship," "the highest quality of leadership;" its administrative details in education as "improvement in rural life and education," better "professional training for teachers," a reshaping of "educational policies for the future."

World Vision

The key-note of world vision for world peace was brilliantly struck in the opening address of the convention by W. G. Cove, president of the National Union of Teachers of England and Wales, who is visiting national educational meetings in several nations with the message that "The school is an international factor of potent force which is within the power of the teachers to use for the destruction or the healing of the nations...We must banish from the schools a nationalism which does not find its highest expression in service to humanity," said Mr. Cove. "I do not believe lasting peace will come on the plane of material concessions and political adjustments. The abiding integration must be sought on the higher plane of intellectual moral and social well-being. It is here the school can play its great part."

Dr. Frederick J. Libby of the National Council for Reduction of Armament, followed with a plea, and concrete suggestions, for making war unlawful as a means of settling disputes between nations by a definite program: (1) some world organization, whatever its name, for settlement of differences; (2) the reduction of armaments to police status; and (3) education of the children away from the glamor of war into a knowledge of what war really is, into international understanding and sympathy.

The Vision of Democracy in Character

The meaning of "democracy" was, perhaps, no better defined than by Dean Henry W. Holmes of the Graduate School of Harvard University:

"Democracy can not be satisfied merely with maintenance of law and order.

"Citizenship in a democracy does not mean mere freedom from interference, whether by kings or by other privileged persons.

"The idea of democracy is that every citizen shall be able to participate in the discussions of common concern, to understand common aims, to guide his own life in the light of that understanding... It demands the development of positive loyalty to common ideals that are understood and freely adhered to."

Character building thus became the dominant note of training for citizenship in the democracies of today and the future, a training that will bring up citizens of not merely passively good character, but citizens with intelligence trained to purposeful activity, individuals not broken up into man physical and man spiritual; into man private and man public; but individuals who enter on life with all-round training ready to meet in the social spirit of a common humanity the industrial, social and political problems of the world of his time.

Self-Discipline Essential

The message of Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes, read by Dean Andrew F. West of Princeton University Graduate School, brought the reminder of the necessity of discipline and training to self-control. "The primary lesson for the citizens of a democracy is self-control," Secretary Hughes wrote, "and this is to be achieved only through self-discipline...

"Life is not a pastime, and democracy is not a holiday excursion. It needs men trained to think, whose muscles are hard with toil.

"Self-denial, hard work, inspiration of teachers of vision, an appreciation of the privileges and obligations of citizenship in a democracy," these Secretary Hughes called fundamental to the true object of education—"a mental and spiritual culture which connotes not only knowledge but character."

RESOLUTION PASSED BY NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

"The safety of the republic rests to a large degree with the teachers of the nation. We call upon teachers everywhere to teach respect for law and order and for constituted authority; to impress alike upon young and old the importance of obedience to the Constitution and to all state and national laws and to local ordinances; to teach the children that laws are made by the majority; and may be changed by the majority; but that they must be obeyed by all; and that he who disobeys the Constitution or laws is an enemy of the republic."

It was natural that with this repeated emphasis on the ideals of, and preparation for citizenship, much attention should be given in the program to the physical fitness of the future citizen. The subject was approached from various angles —the care of the child before school age so that he may be able to get the most possible from school training, the teaching, training in, and practice of health facts and activities, the school surroundings. So far, much of this seems as yet to represent a groping for methods for reaching an ideal which is slowly becoming clearly defined. The purpose is there, and if as yet the plan of operations is somewhat unsettled, the various methods being tried out are certain to leave impress for the health of even the present generation.

With all the discussion on democracy and health, it was somewhat disappointing to hear practically no reference to the school's responsibility for assuring future sobriety. If this represented a confidence that all is well because alcoholic liquors have been prohibited and habit-forming drugs subjected to severe control, the omission was consistent from that point of view. That it represented indifference to the task of the school in training the present generation of youth that must bridge the period between the old drinking days and the period of complete prohibition, is inconceivable. It is true that as no one person could attend all the meetings, the writer may have missed those in which this subject was discussed, but nowhere on the program and in nc session which she attended was there a word even intimating that the school hac any further responsibility in this matter or how it was proposing to meet the nev problems arising in connection witl prohibition, either from a health or a civic point of view. In a meeting wher the chief topic was the fitting of th child to take his place in the responsi bilities of democracies, a constructiv word would have been fitting, or at least protest from educators against the restor ation of beer and wine which would in volve the nullification of the Constitution especially as these are the liquors witl which youth commonly begins to drink The Representative Assembly adopted resolution for training in obedience t law, but it did not use a magnificent op portunity to speak the word for protectin childhood and youth against renewe drinking temptations that none coul speak with more authority. The resolu tion on obedience to law is published o this page.

Hundreds of Teachers Visit Scientific Temperance Exhibit

Several hundred teachers visited th educational temperance exhibit of the de partment of Scientific Temperance In struction of the National W. C. T. U. i the immediate charge of Mrs. E. L. Trai seau, state S. T. I. superintendent fc Massachusetts, and Miss Edith M. Will The stereomotorgraph showed for a doze hours a day the new W. C. T. U. tempe ance slides; the walls were hung wit posters. Thousands of pages of literatu were given and gladly taken away.

The response and suggestions of teac ers and superintendents as to helpfu school material which the Woman Christian Temperance Union can furnis are briefly indicated here because the show the field of opportunity open to u for assuring the sobriety of the comir generation if we do our part!

Teachers were encouraged when the attention was called to the leaflet sho ing the part the schools have played building public sentiment, which result in state and national prohibition legi lation. Praise for the past will he bring co-operation for the future.

The Scientific Temperance monthly ed tion of THE UNION SIGNAL was r ceived with special interest and gra tude when teachers were told that th number contained monthly helps for thei LOCAL UNIONS TAKE NOTE, AN GET IN YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS TO B GIN WITH THE SCHOOL YEAR!

Several hundred envelope packages leaflets on beer and wine were giv away, as well as miscellaneous approp ate literature which visitors selected f themselves. The schools can help me the pressing beer and wine issue a should be helped to do it.

Many asked particularly for helps dealing with the tobacco and cigaret pro lems with school young folks, and w comed all we were able to give thei Material for this purpose had been su plied by the department of Anti-Narcoti and posters from the National W. C. T. Publishing House.

Teachers and superintendents we asked to look at the set of twel posters, "Why America Went Dry" a to tell us if they could be used in the schools. Here are several items of i formation for local unions:

Invariably teachers in grades from t sixth year upward said "Yes." One six year teacher was sure her pupils wou et the lessons the posters teach if the osters were left hanging in the school-oom for a few days. A superintendent uggested that the posters be kept cir-ulating from school to school, showing ne in a room for a week, making it the ubject of lessons, and then moving it on o another room. Thus one set would erve several. One said: "My children ould sop up the information on the post-rs like water if I could have them in my chool room." The remark of another mphasized the eagerness of young minds or information when it is available and ttractively presented: "If anything omes to me that I want the children to et I leave it around in some conspicuous lace—on the piano or somewhere. They et it," she emphasized with a smile. Don't you think that they don't."

One teacher said: "I saw these posters omewhere and wanted them and was old I could get them at the state W. C. . U. Headquarters. I went there but they id not have them. I like these because ey tell something that can be definitely ught."

The attitude of these teachers gave no ncertain encouragement to believe that o stone should be left unturned by local nions to get these posters widely used the schools. Few unions are so poor at they could not raise the $1.50, which all that is needed for the dozen for the hool.

A superintendent said teachers often lled to his attention valuable material at he would not otherwise see. This dicates a way of reaching the superin-ndent, when it is more convenient or acticable than going to him directly.

How friendly school visiting with inter-t expressed in the temperance lesson ould help in getting the temperance teaching done was explained by one teacher: "If the women would come now and then and ask to hear the temperance lessons. Of course they would not come 'with war paint on,' but make just a nice friendly call. Tell them to visit the schools more."

Samples of recent school text-books on hygiene, reference books on alcohol were shown both to teachers and to school librarians who took the titles to recommend for the libraries.

Teachers from a city where an essay contest had been held said on leaving, "If we had only known of this material when the children were preparing their essays."

As we review the experience of the week certain points stand out clearly:

1. The exhibit was a practical demonstration of the work which unions all over the country can do in keeping in touch with the teachers, helping them to obtain the teaching material now on hand and fresh material as it appears.

Who will do this if the W. C. T. U. does not?

2. Teachers can furnish much evidence of the good results of prohibition. They are glad to have for themselves evidence of this kind for "talking" material in the many opportunities they have to talk about the subject with others.

3. The influence of the school in preventing the use of beer and wine must be stressed. These are the drinks with which youth begins. Fill the teachers' hands with material that will enable them to see not only their own responsibility in teaching the facts, but to teach effectively, and to protest against the return of these sources of the drink habit.

"My Kids Are Better Judges Than Me"

"Three years is too soon to decide about the success or failure of a plan which depends upon its enforcement over a huge extent of country and along a broad front of all kinds of human nature gathered from all parts of the world." writes Whiting Williams in Collier's Weekly. "He probably asks too much who says: 'We ought to have seventy years to try out this proposition—until a generation has grown up that never saw a saloon.' But it does look as though we had already forgotten so much that we are no longer good judges ourselves. More than a few of us are like the foreman of whom one employer reports:

" 'He was telling all over the plant how he was through with the whole prohibition idea because more men were drinking on the job than ever before. I asked him why it was we didn't need watchmen at the gates on Monday mornings any more, in spite of his belief. Finally, I learned that he had recently seen on the streets a drunken man. One drunken man! It was the first he'd seen in a couple of years and it had shocked him so much that he had practically lost his head.' "

" 'It's my kids that are better judges than me,' says the maid in a big Pacific Coast hotel. 'Personally I'm pretty sure the room work here's easier than in the old days—the men are in better condition and don't muss things up any more. I may be wrong. But my kids! Say, you oughta see the fuss they make over a drunken man! They follow him for blocks—like a queer animal escaped from a circus! When I was a kid we never looked at 'em twice, that common they was!' "

Bon Voyage to Mrs. Armor

Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, our gifted evangel of prohibition, sails from San Francisco August 4, for New Zealand, on the "Maunganui" of the Union Steamship Company. She goes to that country in response to an urgent invitation from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to help in the campaign for national prohibition on which a popular vote is to be taken this fall. God-speed our beloved comrade as she carries to New Zealand a message from "Prohibition America."

Our Expected Guests From Over Seas

The list of prospective delegates and visitors to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in Philadelphia is receiving many additions. Word is received that Fraulein Gustel von Blucher, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Germany, who is a grandniece of the famous General Blucher who came to Wellington's aid at Waterloo, will be in attendance, accompanied by Fraulein Wilhelmina Lohmann. If the dates for the national election in England permit, Hon. Charles S. Roberts, former member of Parliament, husband of Lady Cecilia Roberts, and his daughter, Miss Christina Roberts, expect to be present, and with them may come Lady Aurea Howard, daughter of the Countess of Carlisle, our lamented World's W. C. T. U. president. Lady Aurea will be remembered by all who attended the World's Convention in Brooklyn, in 1913.

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES AND OTHER INFLUENTIAL ORGANIZATIONS

W. C. T. U. speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

(Through your local papers give wide-spread publicity to the resolutions thus secured.)

Public Sentiment For Beer and Wine?

Whatever may be the result of various "straw" votes now being taken on the prohibition question, there is in the returns from the primary elections already held, indisputable evidence that voters have no intention of casting their ballots for a modification of the prohibitory law. In the one hundred twenty nominations for Congress already made, the drys have gained three in the House of Representatives and two in the Senate. And this against the strongest possible organized opposition of the representatives of the wine and beer interests.

The opponents of prohibition claim that the sentiment in labor circles is almost unanimously against the present prohibition law, and yet at the recent primary election in one of the biggest industrial districts of Pennsylvania, in which are large steel mills, factories and mines, although thousands of dollars were expended by the wets to defeat M. Clyde Kelly, United States Congressman, an outspoken advocate of prohibition, they went down to utter defeat and he was renominated by a vote of three to one.

Don't waste your energy worrying over the result of "straw" votes, but conserve it for work in getting your fellow citizens to VOTE AND VOTE RIGHT AT THE PRIMARIES. There is where ballots will count.

Why the Decrease in Tuberculosis Death Rate?

The remarkable decrease in the death rate from tuberculosis is a matter of interest not only to the medical fraternity but to the laity. In the last fifty years there has been a fall of 77.9 per cent in the tuberculosis death rate in New York City; in the last eleven years a fall of 51 per cent, and in the calendar year of 1921, a fall of 18.1 per cent. It is most important that the causes responsible for such a phenomenon should be discovered in order that health authorities and physicians may know how to combat the dread disease.

Dr. Haven Emerson, former Health Commissioner of New York City, and now a professor in Cornell Medical School, New York, writing in the American Review of Tuberculosis of Baltimore (June, 1922), seems inclined, in considering all the factors involved in this beneficent change, to lay most stress on the improved financial and living conditions of the poor, INCLUDING WITH THIS, DECREASED ALCOHOLISM AND THE LESSENED EXPENDITURE FOR ALCOHOL. He says that it is probably not too much to say that in the next twenty-five years as great a percentage of reduction in tuberculosis can be attained as has been accomplished in the last fifty years, by adding to our methods and resources those which will build up bodily resistance by providing for and following a higher standard of living, and those which will diminish the hazards of occupation and of occupancy.

Alleged Demand of Soldiers For Wine and Beer Wet Propaganda

Aroused by the items appearing in the newspapers, that lead the public to believe that returned convalescent soldiers are sending in requests to the President of the United States for the return of light wines and beers, the inter county convention of the W. C. T. U. recently held in Warren, Pa., requested Mrs. Sylvia Bemis, state superintendent of the work for Soldiers and Sailors, to write to President Harding, and ask if these statements are true, or whether they are propaganda of the opponents of prohibition.

In reply to this inquiry, the following letter was received from the secretary to President Harding:

"Your note of July 20th, to the President, is before me, and in view of the President's deep absorption in pressing public duties, I am going to convey to you as well as possible the answer to your inquiry.

"So far as the mail or communications which come to this office is concerned, I think it is fair to say that they do not reflect any evidence of the alleged powerful demand to which you refer. I am strongly disposed to agree with your judgment that the assumption that such a demand exists is largely unwarranted.

"(Signed) George B. Christian, Jr.,
"Secretary to the President."

It might be well to call this to the attention of the editors of your local papers.

Poll of Women to be Taken by Literary Digest

Complaints are being made to The Literary Digest that the women are not being included in the poll on prohibition as they are not in large numbers on the telephone lists. In a letter from an editor of that periodical to one of our national officers, he says, "We are just starting to mail our ballot cards to several millions of women. The results of this particular part of the ballot will of course, not appear until a later issue of The Literary Digest."

Many friends of the dry law regard the question on The Literary Digest's ballot in regard to a modification of the Volstead Law to permit light wines and beers, as unwarranted and not debatable and therefore will refuse to participate in the poll; to do so might be interpreted as recognition that the question is debatable.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 17-19, 1922.

TRANSPORTATION NOTES

WORLD'S AND NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

A convention rate of one full fare going and one half-fare returning has been granted by all the railroads for the World's and National W. C. T. U. conventions to be held in Philadelphia, November 11-19. Tickets may be purchased November 8 to 14, and the last date for leaving Philadelphia is November 24. The return journey must be made by the same route as the going journey.

A special train will leave the Union Station, Chicago, Friday morning, November 10, at 10:15 via the Pennsylvania railroad. All delegates who can go to Philadelphia as economically by way of Chicago are urged to join this special train party.

Saturday, November 11, Armistice Day, will be spent in Washington, D. C. The train will leave for Philadelphia at 4:30 p. m., arriving at 7:30 p. m.

Many delegates and visitors will wish to visit Atlantic City, which is about an hour's journey from Philadelphia. If a sufficient number desire to make this trip an excursion will be arranged for Monday, November 20.

Secretary Transportation.

Kathleen Norris, Noted Writer, Pleads for Enforcement of Eighteenth Amendment

In Kathleen Norris, recognized as one of the most popular writers of fiction in the United States, the prohibition cause has an eloquent champion. She has enlisted heart and soul in the campaign in California to secure the passage of the state-wide enforcement measure. She is speaking to large audiences, and everywhere her messages call forth enthusiastic approval. Her success is so marked that the anti-prohibition newspapers are devoting editorial space to ridicule and condemnation of her efforts, the highest compliment that can be paid to her endeavors.

In speaking before a large company of women recently she said:

"I don't speak often. When I do make a speech I feel that I can be forgiven on the same grounds that the woman in the Bible was forgiven—because I love much. Today I am standing here because I love my country and because after a good many years of hard work, poverty, discouragement, illness—all the business of wifehood, motherhood, homekeeping—because now in these years I have a little freedom, and like many of the rest of you I have thought to myself, especially in my prayers, that I should be glad before I died to hand on to other women some little share of what love of country and love of God mean to me as a woman. We are all apt to look back into history and feel that in any of the great crises we could have shone brilliantly. We could have handled the work of Florence Nightingale —we could have been a noble Joan of Arc—but it seems to me today that as citizens we are facing an issue as great as any that the world has ever known."

The outstanding thought that Mrs. Norris drives home in her addresses is that the women must come to the rescue in this crucial time, and help to hold the law that has done so much to protect their homes and children. Her plea is to the mothers to live up to their responsibilities as loyal citizens in going to the polls and casting their ballots for the enforcement of the prohibition law, and to use their influence with other mothers, and with their husbands and brothers and friends, to work and vote for men favorable to the Eighteenth Amendment. One of her unique appeals to the patriotism of her audiences is made in these words:

"If anyone would be willing to tear down an American flag and wrap it around a garbage can, then he may consistently sneer at the non-enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, but American patriots must not permit themselves to miss this opportunity for a patriotism fully as great as that offered by service at the front in the World War."

Think!

John H. Patterson, the veteran industrial magnate, head of the National Cash Register Company, had the injunction "Think" plastered liberally on the walls of office and factories. It had the effect of making his employes ponder before they acted and prevented many costly blunders.

Would that it might be posted in letters a foot high wherever men and women congregate in this country, and in letters a foot high be displayed in the polling booths at primaries and elections.

Before you mark your ballot THINK about your responsibility as a father, a citizen, a patriot, a Christian.

THINK whether by your vote for the men and women who are to make or unmake the laws for this nation you are rendering it easier or more difficult for your neighbor or your neighbor's son or daughter to go wrong.

THINK! THINK! THINK!

Thirst Versus Purse

Collier's, for July 22, tells an interesting story of a gentleman who, wishing to stock his country home with liquor, bought $22,000 worth of whiskies, wines and cordials from bootleggers, and paid cash on delivery. That night the bootleggers turned burglars, entered the house before adequate locks or burglar alarms had been installed, and stole back their cargo of liquors, carting it off in two large motor trucks. There was no complaint to the police, for the wealthy gentleman was himself guilty of law-breaking, and knew it.

"Perhaps," says Collier's, commenting editorially on the story, which had been taken from a newspaper, "one by one those whose thirsts are as long as their purses will discern that in slaking the former they are simply breaking down the protection which the law has through centuries been building up for the latter."

And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

"Woman, Why Weepest Thou?"

It was to a woman that the risen Christ appeared first on that Easter morning centuries ago, and it was to her that he spake his first gentle words of comfort. .....We may not see that wondrous form, but by the guidance of some unseen hand the tears of womankind still are being wiped away. Not the tears of unexpected joy or racking grief—the expression of honest sentiment; nor yet the tears of maudlin sentimentality which represent no more genuine feeling than the glycerin tears of the moving picture screen. But the tears of pain and sorrow over the world's manifold ills—they are being dried as by the Master's kindly words.

"Woman, why weepest thou?"

"Because they have killed my only son —a sacrifice to war and greed and lust for power."

Within these past few months we have seen, we hope, the last of such tears as these. With navies scrapped, with armies reduced in size, with many of war's dreadful engines of destruction burned; with such a conference as that at Washington; the world draws nearer to an end of war, with all its death and tears, than at any time in the centuries since Jesus lived on earth. "Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted." Can we but enter upon an era of international good will, when the brother love that He taught shall be true in fact, the tears of women shall not have been shed in vain.

"Woman, why weepest thou?"

"Because my husband is a drunkard, who neglects his home and his children, wasting his means, ruining his health and his mind."

Even today, with an imperfect prohibition, her tears are being wiped away and many and many a home is brighter and better and happier. For more than two years the saloon has been closed, and though in big cities the bootlegger flourishes and the home brewer makes his blinding concoctions, the restriction of strong drink is seventy-five per cent effective, and the mother who faced the future of her son with fear and trembling, can put away her apprehensions in the gradual total elimination of temptation.

President of New York W. C. T. U. and Officer of A. A. P. A. Debate Prohibition

The Eighteenth Amendment was the subject of a spirited debate before the Stuyvesant Heights Public Forum, Brooklyn, New York, recently. The principals were Mrs. Ella A. Boole, vice-president of the National W. C. T. U., and president of the New York W. C. T. U., and Col. Charles L. Withrow, assistant secretary of the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment. Mrs. D. Leigh Colvin, vice-president of the New York W. C. T. U. also spoke briefly. Mrs. Boole declared that the attempt to bring back light wines and beer was only another way for the liquor traffic to get back into power; that if we permit the return of these beverages we are certain to bring back ninety per cent of the liquor traffic and there will result such an orgy of drunkenness as was never before witnessed.

Col. Withrow insisted that he was against the saloon but believed that illicit sale was doing more harm than the legalized traffic in light wines and beer.

The Brooklyn Eagle, in reporting the meeting said, "Because a majority seemed to favor the prohibition law, it was decided to continue the discussion until another meeting."

Mrs. Armor Speaks to Big Audiences in California

"We will repeal the Eighteenth Amendment when we rescind the Declaration of Independence," declared Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, to a capacity audience at Woodland, California, recently. "We can and will enforce the prohibitory law. To say it cannot be enforced is to declare that democracy is a failure; is to declare that every American boy who lies in Flanders Field gave his life in vain; is to declare that the Church of Christ is impotent." Thus did the great W. C. T. U. woman orator answer those who claim and pretend to believe that prohibition is a failure and that the law cannot be enforced. Mrs. Armor continued:

"So great a failure is prohibition that the per capita consumption of liquor in the United States has only been reduced from twenty-two gallons to one-half gallon."

She paid her respects to the indifferent church members who take little or no interest in public affairs, but are content to say, "Thy will be done," and let it go at that. " 'Thy will be done' doesn't mean a pair of shaky knees and a spineless back. It means a good right arm and the will to fight for the things that are right, and in accord with the Divine will."

Mrs. Armor is spending her last days before sailing for New Zealand in making campaign speeches to arouse the citizens of California to work for the Wright state enforcement measure.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

"A Singing Army a Victorious One"

Anna Adams Gordon

It would be difficult to put into words my great enjoyment of the four state conventions or summer encampments of the Young People's Branch, which it has been my happy privilege to attend in Toledo, Ohio, Dubois, Pennsylvania, Lewes, Delaware, and Cook Academy, Montour Falls, New York.

My spirit was refreshed and my faith in the permanence of our organized activities was strengthened. These young people expressed their love for the W. C. T. U., and their pride in being our younger brothers and sisters. I found them zealous for the promotion of our leading departments of work. I met many gifted college students, young men and women capable of carrying an inspiring and informing message to the young people of their respective states.

Their meetings were marked by spiritual power; their jolly social stunts were tuneful and spontaneous! Their discussion of current questions was clear and convincing. Their department demonstrations, revealing remarkable initiative and artistic talent, were highly entertaining and educational. If "a singing army is a victorious one" the Y. P. B. is bound to win in the struggle against nullifiers and in our constructive program for peace, purity, Christian citizenship and prohibition.

We bid God-speed to these and other members of the Young People's Branch. We hope the young men and women graduates will continue their temperance activities as honorary and regular members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

When One Is Dissociated

Emma L. Transeau

[This story illustrates the conditions described as stages of intoxication in the book on "Alcohol—Its Action on the Human Organism," issued by the Research Committee of the British Board of Liquor Control and further elaborated by Charles F. Harford in the British Journal of Inebricty, April, 1922.]

"I know wine is good for me because I feel so much better after I have had a drink. My brain is sharper and works more easily. I can talk without stopping to think about what I am going to say."

Evelyn entered her mother's sitting room with her school bag on her arm just in time to hear this remark from her Aunt Percy, a social leader in a distant city, who had come to make her mother a long delayed visit.

Knowing her mother's views on the subject, Evelyn was curious to hear her reply.

"That reminds me," her mother began with a little smile, "of the story of the man who tried to teach his son when he had had enough beer.

" 'You see those two men on that seat yonder,' the father said. 'Now if I should see four men there instead of two it would be time for me to stop.'

" 'But, Father,' the son objected, 'there are not two men on the seat. There is only one man.' "

"I don't see how your story fits my remark," protested Aunt Percy.

"Your wine deceives you about your feelings just as the man's beer deceived him into thinking he saw two men where there was only one."

"Why, mother, that is exactly the story our psychology teacher told us today to illustrate dissociation."

"Yes, that is precisely what alcohol does," answered Mrs. Van Buren, whose own college days were not so far behind her daughter's that she did not understand the terms of modern psychology.

"When Aunt Percy finds that a glass of wine enables her to talk without stopping to think, that means that wine has dissociated her speech centers from her critical faculty. She is no longer hampered by the fear that she may not state facts as they are."

"Eleanor, are you trying to offend me?" expostulated Aunt Percy.

"No, indeed, sister. You are no exception to the rest of human kind. I am just stating what happens when the alcohol in wine or beer, or any other alcoholic liquor comes in contact with the human brain. Here it is described in this magazine I have just been reading. Read it, Evelyn. I saved it to show to you."

Evelyn read: "A feeling of well-being and blunted self-criticism is the earliest stage of dissociation produced by alcohol. By it the pleasure-feeling is given free play without any concern about reality. Hence the light, vivacious, but irresponsible after-dinner speech."

"Well, it seems to me that the name you give it, 'dissociation,' is more startling than the thing itself," defended Aunt Percy. "It sounds like a disease."

"It is the beginning of a series of stages that may lead to disease if frequently repeated. Ordinarily we call it intoxication which means poisoning. But I like the word 'dissociation' because it describes the effect on the mind. Read the description of the following stages, Evelyn."

Evelyn read on: "Self-satisfaction with work that is really poor, carelessness where a normal person would be cautious, disregard of conventionalities ordinarily respected, talkativeness and argumentativeness. These mark the second stage of dissociation produced by alcohol."

"Percy", demanded Evelyn's mother, suddenly, "do you remember your little classmate, Hetty Kimball, and what she did at your coming-out party?"

"Yes, and Father made us drop her from our list of friends. He said that a girl who would so far forget herself as to drink until she did not know when she was behaving immodestly was not a fit associate for his daughter."

"And yet all she drank was two glasses of wine. I know because she was with me up to the time she jumped up and began her wild dance."

"Mamma", said Evelyn, mischievously, "are you perfectly sure that you kept your own head clear enough to count straight?"

"Oh, yes", Aunt Percy replied for her sister. "Your mother would never touch the wine at all. Our father used to scold her for that. He said she ought to learn to drink just a little to be sociable."

"Yes, Percy", assented her sister, sadly. "And you and I years afterward had the humiliation of seeing our father in the third stage of dissociation when he was carried into the house one night nearly insensible after a club dinner."

"I felt the disgrace of that keenly", said Aunt Percy. "He did not practice in his later years what he always preached when we were young about stopping before one began to show the effects."

"Ah! there was where he did not understand dissociation", exclaimed Evelyn. "I see now, Mamma is right. The loss of ability to distinguish between reality and fancy is produced so stealthily by a little alcohol that one is unaware of it."

"Well", concluded Aunt Percy, "your mother always did get the better of me in an argument, and now that I have two against me I give up. I don't care enough about wine to waste time and temper defending it, and I shall be afraid after this that if I take it I shall become dissociated."

Youth's Challenge

1922 Prize Song. Willard Branch, Elmira, N. Y.

(Tune: "On Miami Shore")

Down in the Valley of Elah,
Back when the world was young,
Youth in the form of a David
Challenged the foeman to come.
Down through the ages Youth's story
Thrills with its message clear.
While there are wrongs to be righted
Youth always will answer, "Here!"

CHORUS
Y. P. B., you stand for all that's fine and true.
I will pledge my youth and strength to stand with you.
That the world a purer, better place may be Until Truth's white light dispels earth's night.
Oh, Y. P. B.

Tho' poppies are blooming in Flanders,
Hiding the Crosses bare,
The Spirit of Youth still is living
Ready to do and to dare.
Out o'er the world Youth is marching
With emblem a Ribbon White
Till it enfolds all the nations
In purity, peace and light.

"What If We Are Dry?"

A barkeeper on an American liner is said by The New York Herald to have told this incident that occurred on a trip across the Atlantic:

"Once when we opened the bar a party came into the cafe—three men and three women. I'd call them the sporty people of, say, the small commuting town's country club. I'd take the men to be little brokers or real estate dealers or something like that. Got into knickerbockers, the men did, the moment they got on ship. Lots of new-looking luggage. Everything seemed new about them—their clothes, money and themselves.

"Apt to call waiter George and the barkeep Eddie. The men went in for patent leather hair and manicures. The women were a little too well done.

"I'd say the average age of the six was 30. That shows they weren't freshmen at living. Well, they start a party the minute we open the bar. There's a lot of talk about no more freedom in the States and how they may buy England if they like it and live there for the rest of their lives. They start with bacardi cocktails and wind up with champagne. I knew they would drink that way. That sort always does.

"Inside of an hour and a half they were all plastered. The next day two of the men come in, asking for whisky sours to cure them of the hangover they had. There was a Britisher on board and he was at the bar. The Americans and he got to talking and after a while he began to josh them a little. And, to my surprise, the older of the two Americans takes the kidding seriously.

"He bawled the Britisher out in grand style. It would have made a great temperance speech. It was in pretty poor taste, seen and heard from some angles, but it seems that the American thought the Britisher was joshing America, when he was only having a bit of fun about the easy way the American had been bowled over the night before.

" 'What if we are dry in the States?' yells the American a trifle too loud, maybe, but I sort of perked up, thinking of some of the barroom arguments I used to hear. 'What if we are dry? We're a lot sight better off.'

"Get that! From a collar advertisement boy who you'd take for a guy who wouldn't put up a fight anywhere.

" 'What if the States is dry?' says he to the Englishman. 'That's our business, and as I said, we're a sight better off. Look at the bank deposits and look at the men buying houses instead of hooch. Good thing for everybody to go dry.'

"He went on like that even after the Britisher slipped away. Of course I took it to be remorse talking, but none of that party drank another drop during the trip. This is only one instance. I've seen it happen a hundred times. Maybe you can account for it. The only way I have of accounting for it is that Americans have got out of the habit of drinking and they find it hard to get their hand in again or their stomachs in again, whichever way you want to put it."

A Thief's Warning

James W. Hanbery

It was Monday morning in the police court of a modern city, and a variegated assemblage of prisoners, among whom could be found men and women from every strata of present-day society, huddled miserably before the municipal judge to answer for their delinquencies. Among the accused were a few who looked with squinting and sullen eyes toward the magistrate, sitting aloof in cold dignity, (for often had they felt the power of his office) while well to the rear, with heads bowed, stood those whose lives were less checkered, but whose countenances bore trace of the guilt of their own thoughts.

Standing a few feet apart from the other prisoners, as if he were trying to avoid an atmosphere which seemed to him degrading, was Richard Morton, an eighteen-year-old clerk. His well moulded face was buried in his hands and he was quietly sobbing. It did not take an experienced criminologist to decipher his case—this was his first appearance in court.

The clerk of the court called one by one the names on the trial docket, and following a short statement of the facts by the arresting officers, the judge meted out justice with a vigor that, in most cases, brought tears and wails. Judge Charles Hamilton Foster, who was sitting on the bench this Monday morning, believed in the dignity of the law, and he did everything within his power to strike fear into the heart of the criminal.

Two hours had passed when the court sergeant suddenly rushed up to Richard Morton, jerked him by the arm, and cried:

"Didn't you hear your name called? What do you want us to do, send you a summons on a gold platter? The judge wants to see you and he isn't feeling very patient this morning. Come along and make it snappy."

Drying his tear-stained eyes, and biting his lips, Richard accompanied the officer to a place before the judge. During the twelve hours he had been incarcerated in the city jail, he had at times come to believe the judge would have mercy on him when he explained his case and called attention to the fact that this was his first offense. But now he stood speechless—the many sentences pronounced by the judge upon a score or more men and women had sealed his lips.

"What is the charge against this prisoner?" Judge Foster asked the clerk in a matter-of-fact way.

"Passing a forged check, and drunkenness, your honor."

"Guilty or not guilty?" interrogated the judge as he fixed his eyes on the prisoner. Richard did not answer in the words he had so carefully selected. His lips refused to move, and when again questioned by the court, he slowly nodded his head and the tears started to flow afresh.

"Cut out that crying, kid," warned the court attendant. "Those tears aren't going to buy you anything with the judge. He's used to them. Be a man and take what he is going to hand out to you. It will be a bitter pill, but you'll stand it, and besides you'll have a bed for the winter."

When asked by the judge for an explanation, Richard still maintained silence. His thoughts had wandered to a poorly furnished cottage in another state where lived a tired, widowed mother, with four little children, who depended upon him for support. He knew the disgrace would be more than the lonely little mother could stand.

"You are not dumb, are you, boy?" the court finally asked.

A shake of the head was the only response from the youthful offender.

At this juncture, the entire courtroom became absolutely silent, with eyes focussed alternately on the judge and the boy. Judge Foster had never been known to tolerate an infringement on his dignity.

For a few seconds, the magistrate looked at Richard as though he were debating just what form of punishment he would impose. Suddenly he wheeled in his massive chair, and directing his attention toward the court sergeant, ordered:

"I wish you would bring Dan Burke in

Sober and Glad of It

Whiting Williams in Collier's Weekly

The labor leaders can hardly be expected to take openly the favorable side of a question as yet so full of bias and excitement. One thing is sure, the worker revolution so freely prophesied has not come off. Neither has the threatened exodus of foreign-born workers. Nevertheless, the new state of affairs has introduced a new element into the labor problem. Listen to one observant employer:

"In the old days a strike among our men was likely to get nasty and riotous within a few hours. The meetings were apt to be near, or perhaps in, saloons. The rest followed automatically. Now the men remain day after day in full possession of sober minds. As a result, the real grievances on one side or the other get a lot more consideration than ever before."

Some of the local leaders are uncertain as to just what is going to happen to them. Other national labor heads already are seeing new possibilities for the good of their members. I'm only sorry I can't give the name or indicate the important standing of this one, who spoke only under the seal of secrecy:

"Outside of the personal liberty question which you know we labor people are strong for, the question of drink or no drink would be decided by the union men mainly in favor of no drink. That's partly because they're seeing what the money that used to stop in the saloon can do for their families at home. It's partly, also, because they see what some of that money can do for them in the plant. An acquaintance of mine, a superintendent, tells of what he said in the old days to one of his directors who saw a drunken worker come into the plant and tried to tell the super to fire him. The super had been in the ranks himself and knew a thing or two. He asked his director: 'Well, if all our workmen were like you and me—didn't drink and saved all their money—do you suppose for a minute that the company would have won the last strike as quickly as it did?"

In all probability strikes will be less numerous in the future because of the larger chance for sober minds to get together. By the same token, those that do occur will show less violence.

Pat: "Sure, Mike, there's more whisky drunk in America now than before it went dry."

Mike: "Right you are, Pat, and not only that. Just see the people that keep away because they can't get it."

At this point Pat's birthright asserted itself and leaning over he said in a whisper, "Say, Mike, one of us has lied."

Have You Heard?

An alleged moonshiner recently visited the Rev. Atticus Webb, of the Texas Anti-Saloon League. The superintendent recognized the man and asked him how he was.

"Oh! bum," said the moonshiner, "I am busted."

"What about those cases in the Federal Court?"

"Well," said the moonshiner, "I am clear of them, but it took the last dollar I had."

"What about that $12,000 you had on deposit in the bank two years ago?"

"Well," said the moonshiner, "it is all gone."

"Say, Doctor," continued the moonshiner, "I'll tell you this moonshining business don't pay. I'm through."

A Thief's Warning

here. I want this young man to form his acquaintance."

The sergeant immediately went in search of Burke who was then in a private cell awaiting a hearing in the district court for highway robbery. Shortly, Burke, in custody of the police officer, stood before the judge. His ragged clothing and unshaven face seemed to augment his well established criminal traits, which were known to most of the police officials throughout the country. At his side, as a contrast, stood Richard, with clean face, well brushed hair and clothing of the neatest.

"Dan, you have been in jail scores of times in your life, and you are due for a long sentence to the penitentiary. I want you to tell this boy your story," explained Judge Foster.

With this announcement, every person in the court-room crowded toward the front. It was a picturesque scene. Standing to the right was Burke, steeped in crime from the soles of his feet to the crown of his head, and bearing a reputation that made him an object of fear. To the left was Richard Morton, caught on the threshold of his first crime, and between the two sat the judge, resolute and determined—the representative of the people interpreting the laws.

"I'll do it for a package of cigarets," replied Burke. "I don't want to show your honor any disrespect, but I ain't had a smoke for the last three days and I am about to die. You get me the smokes, judge, and I'll tell my story."

An intent listener standing near, a stranger to Burke, reached into his own pocket and supplied the notorious criminal.

Burke put a cigaret to his lips and with trembling hands lighted it. As he took a deep inhalation he steadied himself against the clerk's desk, and looking at Richard Morton, began to speak, while every person in the court room, including the dignified and austere judge, leaned forward to hear what Dan Burke was going to say.

"Boy, I was a youngster pretty much like you one time, just about your same height. I was a 'smart Aleck' and thought there was no one in the neighborhood like me," Burke explained. "I began drinking and I was a regular village cutup, boasting of every wrong I did.

"I had a good mother and father. They thought the world of me and I thought the world of them. Imagine how they felt when I committed my first crime and the news was broken to them. Mother cried for a week and her hair turned grey in a little while. Father did all he could to fix up the case. I promised the judge I would never steal again and he let me go.

"I was a good boy for a long time and then I got to thinking I was pretty smart, so I stole again. This time I went to jail. I served time, got out, stole, and was put back in jail again.

"Mother died while I was serving time. I caused her death—heaven forgive! This caused me to drink more than ever and I went from bad to worse. The police began to welcome me with open arms, for they knew that when I was in jail a little of the crime would cease for the time being.

"Boy, you see me here. I am nothing but a bum and am soon to take a trip to the 'pen' where I will, perhaps, remain for the rest of my life—my best days are over. The law has got the goods on me this time for they caught me red-handed trying to do a highway job. Now I haven't a home, nor a relative that would own me.

"Sonny, you can't beat the law. Wrecked and outcast though I am, I beg you never to drink again. If I could stop drinking I could stop my desires for all other crimes but this liquor gets into your blood and soon you have a habit you can't quit, and crimes become natural.

"Take the last advice I'll ever offer you—ask the judge for another chance and when he gives it to you, brace up and be a man. Keep booze out of your life.

With this last statement Burke, accompanied by an officer, left the room, and shortly afterward, far off in another corner of the building, a great door made of iron bars was heard to slam shut.

Richard's head was raised now. With eyes still misty, he looked at the judge and said:

"Judge, I want to take Dan's advice. Won't you give me a chance?"

"Burke was given a chance and he didn't make good. Do you think you can?" interrogated the court. "He was a boy like you. He had good parents, but he thought he was the wisest boy in town and could get by with anything he did. Now he is a highwayman and not even good at that for he got caught. There is an example of how low a man can fall.

"You have butted your head up against the penitentiary walls. By forging, you have assaulted American business principles. I am going to let you go this time for the man you defrauded has consented to stand the loss.

"You are not a criminal, boy. It was that foolish stuff you put inside of you that caused you to commit a crime that came near ruining your future. Remember this, and obey the laws. Go out and be a man."

With a heart bounding with joy, Richard thanked the judge and almost ran from the court-room. As he was crossing the street, he heard a sharp whistle, and turning his eyes toward the direction from which it came, he saw a bearded face pressed against the heavy steel bars guarding the massive windows of the fourth floor cells.

Automatically, the two waved their hands in parting. Richard from that day on obeyed Dan's advice. And Dan? It was not long before he answered for his crimes to the Judge who is over us all.

"Seeing Is Believing"

Your anti-prohibition friend likes to say that "it was not giving a fair show to the boys who fought for us, to pass the Amendment while they were at the front." Show him (or her) this map of the status of prohibition in January, 1917, before the United States entered the war, at which time twenty-six entire states were dry (prohibition was enacted during that year in three more), and hundreds of counties in the other states. The area under no-license, at the beginning of the year, comprised 2,614,071 square miles, out of a total area of 2,973,890 square miles, 87.8 per cent. Or, remembering that the population was massed in the large cities, and that those centers where the population was largely foreign were the wet centers, 60.7 per cent of the population of the United States was under prohibition, on January, four months before war was declared.

You might also remind your argumentative friend that the Congress which submitted the Eighteenth Amendment was elected in November, 1916—five months before the United States declared war.

What the Liquorites Expect

William Jennings Bryan

No intelligent wet has any hope of repealing the Eighteenth Amendment; neither has any intelligent wet any hope of a law permitting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages. So long as the Eighteenth Amendment remains, the Supreme Court will be compelled to nullify any law permitting the use of enough alcohol to make beverages intoxicating. All that the wets hope for is a majority in the House or Senate—just enough to enable them to block appropriations for enforcement. Any man who represents the wet side of the contest will oppose appropriations and thus invite an era of lawlessness in which the liquor traffic can do as it pleases. The real question is law or lawlessness and that issue supersedes all others. We cannot have government without obedience to law.—The Commoner.

Attention, State, District and County Presidents

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

Convention time approaches, and from all directions, consecrated, humanity-loving, far-seeing, alert women will be assembling to hear reports of what has been done and to plan for future work for our great cause. These gatherings encourage, strengthen and inspire. Have you not returned home from such meetings enthused, ready to tackle any problem; we might say, running "in high," and then after a few weeks of routine life, you settled back into a state of inactive interest?

One of the reasons why this happened is that you did not keep in touch with all the vital issues of our work. This being true, why not take home with you this year something that will keep you running "in high," that is, YOUR paper, THE UNION SIGNAL. And because it will help you, it is self-evident it will help your sisters in all local unions. Why not see to it that on every program of district, county or state convention, this all-year-round energizer, THE UNION SIGNAL, has a place, with time enough allowed to have its merits convincingly set forth, and the privilege of subscribing given at a period when there is a good attendance. Programs are made up weeks ahead of convention time, so attend to this now. Don't "let George do it." You do it. Then you know it will be done.

If you can't be a pine on the top of the hill,
Be a scrub in the valley—but be
The best little scrub on the side of the hill;
Be a bush if you can't be a tree.

If you can't be a bush, be a bit of the grass—
Some highway to happier make;
If you can't be a muskie, then just be a bass,
But the liveliest bass in the lake!

We can't all be captains; some have to be crew;
There's something for all of us here;
There's big work to do, and there's lesser to do,
And the task we must do is the near.

If you can't be a highway, then just be a trail;
If you can't be a sun, be a star.
It isn't by size that you win or you fail—
Be the BEST of whatever you are.

PLANS FOR SENATE VOTE ON TARIFF ON AUGUST 17 FRUSTRATED—TWO DEATHS IN CONGRESS WITHIN ONE WEEK—HOME ECONOMICS TO HAVE BUREAU IN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—CONDENSED MILK MANUFACTURERS PROTEST AGAINST HOUSE BILL—STATE LAWS RELATIVE TO PRESCRIPTION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Plans for Vote in Senate on Tariff August 17 Frustrated

Early in the week a tentative agreement was reached by Republican and Democratic leaders to dispose of all committee amendments to the tariff bill by August 11, after which date individual amendments would have been discussed and acted upon, with those still pending at 11 o'clock of the day of the final vote and to be passed upon without further debate. Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin upset these plans, which would have resulted in a final vote by August 17, by objecting to the proposed arrangement, at least until all important amendments have been acted upon.

While there is considerable difference of opinion in Washington regarding the time of passage of the tariff bill by the Senate, we find no one willing to forecast its passage by August 31. A study of predictions, statements, forecasts and best judgments here support the belief that it will be after September 1 before the vote is taken in the Senate. Then the bill goes into conference, where it is expected to take several weeks, perhaps a longer time, before it can be enacted into law. Consideration of the wool schedule, which has furnished the one big fight in the administration tariff bill, was completed this week after the approval without change of imports proposed by the finance committee majority on blankets, wearing apparel and floor coverings.

House Leaders Arranging for Three-Day Recess

Acting on the belief that the tariff bill would still be before the Senate August 15, Republican leaders conferred with Democratic leaders with a view to agreeing on a legislative truce after that date, and until the tariff is ready to go to conference.

When the House recessed until the middle of August it was with the expectation that by that time the tariff would be disposed of by the Senate. If it develops later that there is little likelihood of a vote by then, House leaders hope to agree to meet every three days and adjourn without transacting business. Meanwhile, members could stay at home and look after their campaigns.

Two Deaths in Congress Within One Week

The death of Senator William E. Crow of Pennsylvania this week makes the third vacancy in the U. S. Senate from Pennsylvania within ten months. Senator P. C. Knox died on October 12 last and Senator Boise Penrose on New Year's eve. Senator Crow was appointed by Governor Sproul to the Knox vacancy until a successor was elected in November. Major David A. Reed of Pittsburgh was nominated in the May Republican primary, both for the unexpired term and the full term beginning March next.

Representative L. P. Padgett, who died this week at his home in Washington, was first elected from the Seventh Tennessee district to the Fifty-seventh Congress, and had served continuously in the House for twenty-two years. He was dean of his delegation. Because of illness he had been unable to return to Tennessee to conduct his campaign for renomination in the state primary, held the day after his death. Mr. Padgett was war time chairman of the House Naval Committee and recently made a fight against any cut in the Navy personnel.

Reports from Tennessee show that despite the fact Mr. Padgett died the day before the primary he was renominated by more than a thousand majority over his competitor.

Home Economics to Have Bureau in Department of Agriculture

According to a recent announcement, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace proposes to consolidate all the home economic activities of his department in one bureau, under a woman chief. This will constitute a valuable departure. To say nothing of her other functions in making the home, the actual work of the farm woman is nearly as important as that of her husband. The farm is made prosperous not in the dairy or in the pasture alone, but in the kitchen, in the poultry yard, in the backyard garden. In farming communities the home is almost the only center. As it proves a success so the agricultural life of the community is a success.

In the Department of Agriculture, work for women has grown steadily. What has been known as the office of Home Economics was in 1915 created as a part of the extension service. In this work a great deal of attention has been given to studies of foods and how best to use them, labor-saving devices for the home, studies of dressmaking and materials, etc. While work of this sort is planned primarily for the women on the farms, much of it is equally helpful to the women in the cities, especially to those in moderate circumstances who must exercise economy and get the greatest value for the money spent.

Condensed Milk Manufacturers Protest Against House Bill

The Voight "filled milk" bill, which passed the House a few weeks ago, is having consideration by the Senate Agriculture Committee. Representatives of manufacturers of condensed milk protested this week against the enactment of the bill, which would prohibit use of vegetable oils in prepared milk.

Medicinal Provisions in National Prohibition Act

Not more than one pint of spirituous liquor nor more than one-fourth gallon of vinous liquor shall be prescribed for use by the same person within a period of ten days. Prescriptions must be written upon prescribed forms except in emergency cases. No physician shall be provided with more than one hundred prescription blanks for use in any period of ninety days unless he shall make it clearly appear to the Commissioner that for some extraordinary reason a larger amount is necessary. The physician is required to keep a record of all such prescriptions.

SOME OF THE TACTICS OF THE "WETS" TO DEFEAT THE "DRYS" IN THE COMING ELECTIONS

"It can be said truthfully and without fear of successful contradiction, that national prohibition is a despotism of despicable religious zealots, who were aided in its corrupt accomplishment with the money of multi-millionaire civilians and soft drink corporations, and the votes of cowardly lobby whip-lashed legislative puppets, and that it is a stench in the nostrils of every decent liberty-loving American citizen, also that it cannot endure, because unless the laws of a nation are made by its best citizens, it must wither and decay."

These words close a ten-page treatise on "Prohibition Above the Constitution," and are over the signature of one W. C. Downing, who, in a letter accompanying this most interesting document, declares that he is "not interested in any industries, directly or indirectly, that would be benefited by the enforcement or the failure to enforce these infamous (prohibition) laws." This is only one of the many pieces of literature on the subject being given wide circulation during these months before the fall elections, either by professed independent writers, or by specific organizations.

According to their own showing, the various associations which have been formed to oppose prohibition are making good progress toward the attainment of their desires—the election of wet Congressmen in November. In every state they are pushing the drive, either secretly, as seems to be the case in New Jersey, or in the open, as in Illinois and Ohio. "We are working tooth and nail," remarked one veteran wet leader to a representative of the Christian Science Monitor, which is publishing a series of articles, describing the wet activities, "and we have a good chance to win." "If you work twenty-four hours a day, there is no telling what may happen," added another prominent leader of the anti-prohibition forces.

Judging from the amount of propaganda being put forth, a sample of which has already been quoted, it is assuredly a twenty-four-hour-a-day campaign, for by letter, by circular, and by poster, as well as by word of mouth, the people of this and other countries are being assured directly and indirectly that prohibition, taken from any and every point of view, is one great failure, that it increases the very evils it claimed to be seeking to cure, and that it will not last.

As a sample of the way these organizations are working, take the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, which issued, from its headquarters in Washington, D. C., a pamphlet in which the leaders "endeavor to answer questions frequently asked by members and others." Question 6 reads, "Does the Association use: (1) Publicity, and (2) Advertisements in the newspapers in connection with its work?" We quote a part of the reply: "We now have a publicity department with a newspaper man in charge and are issuing news articles regularly in reply to the prohibitionists' propaganda articles which are flooding the columns of the daily press.....Newspaper advertising is now a permanent feature of our work, and we are defraying this expense out of our own funds."

Not only are the news articles being issued with great regularity, but if a newspaper or magazine will not print material which comes from an avowedly damp source, similar material is furnished through channels apparently having no connection with the wets. Editors and politicians are also being approached.

This campaign of the A. A. P. A. is being conducted on a huge scale. A member at the New York state headquarters, telling a press representative something of the scope of the work, said, "We have scattered over the entire state, 160 captains, each having under his direction ten or more 'minute men.' Captains and workers are entirely on a volunteer basis." These workers, numbering two thousand or more, are actively spreading the propaganda of legalized beer and wine. Also, paid office workers are traveling throughout the state, giving talks and instructions to the volunteer workers and others who are interested in the "cause." Speakers are to be sent out generally to public meeting places, theaters, and even churches, wherever this is possible.

In Buffalo, New York, a poster campaign for "Moderation" is being waged, under the auspices of the Merchants' Liberty League. These posters are published under the general title of the "Personal Liberty Review," in what is termed an "Illustrated Liberal Cartoon Service," and are being displayed in soft drink and other places. Specious arguments against prohibition are made and the public is urged to "vote for liberal men who are not afraid to tell how they stand" and to "co-operate with any movement that will bring another shoulder to the wheel."

In Massachusetts the "Constitutional Liberty League" has already succeeded in having the state enforcement code, which had been signed by Governor Cox,

Harmful Effects of Liquor Discussed at Meeting of British Medical Association

Preponderance of opinion against alcohol clearly marked the discussion which took place at the closing meeting of the British Medical Association's congress in Glasgow, according to cable dispatches.

Ten years ago alcohol was certainly regarded by British doctors generally as a valuable stimulant, but Dr. Edward Mellany, professor of Pharmacology at Sheffield University, in addressing the gathering, declared that the word "stimulant" had become a misnomer, that it meant narcotic. Dr. John T. McCurdy of Cornell Medical College, New York, while refusing to express an opinion on the merits of prohibition, nevertheless designated alcohol a poison which liberates the abnormal reactions and increases any fundamental tendency to abnormality. Sir Frederick Mott, pathologist of London County Council asylums, described alcohol as a weed killer. Dr. C. Sullivan, medical superintendent of Broadmoor criminal lunatic asylum, believed alcohol to be but a negligible factor in causing insanity, but an important cause of other mental disorders, and of grave anti-social conduct. It produces "an unsound mind in an unsound body." Dr. Edgar L. Collis of the Welsh National School of Medicine asserted that industrial accidents varied in proportion to the consumption of alcohol, and the time was coming when Great Britain might be compelled to follow the example of America, where prohibition appears to be associated with greatly improved industrial efficiency. Dr. M. Hindhede of Copenhagen discussed the surprising effect of war-rationing (which included restricted consumption of alcohol). The rate of mortality dropped from 12.5 to 10.4 per 1000, the lowest figure ever registered in a European country. Sir George Toulmin, well-known Liberal politician, speaking as an employer, said that not merely excessive, but even habitual (moderate) drinking injured efficiency.

The proceedings ended with a resolution requesting the association's counsel to assist in a further inquiry into the effect of alcohol as a beverage on the individual and the community.

Police Figures Show Marked Progress for Prohibition in Boston

Arrests for drunkenness in Boston, according to a statement recently made by Captain Charles T. Reardon of the Boston police department's vice squad, have decreased 55 per cent in the two dry years, 1920-21, as against the six wet years, 1912-18. Co-operation between state and Federal officers, a growing sentiment favorable to prohibition, and realization on the part of the liquor dealers that theirs is a losing fight, are bringing about the improved conditions, which are not confined to Boston but embrace the state.

Labor Forces in Washington for Prohibition

At the recent meeting of the state Federation of Labor, held in Bremerton, Washington, a resolution was introduced by the Seattle union, according to press reports, favoring the amendment of the Volstead Act to permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. The convention, however, realizing that the sentiment of the state is overwhelmingly for the maintenance and enforcement of prohibition, referred the resolution back to the Seattle union with the suggestion that a referendum on moral issues could best be carried out by the individual union concerned.

In commenting on the resolution, the Spokane Spokesman-Review has the following to say:

"A referendum on this question by the labor unions would open the eyes of Mr. Gompers and the executive council, particularly if the wives, sisters and daughters of the members of organized labor were allowed to take part in it. A referendum on that question in Spokane, for instance, would show that a very large majority of the voters are resolutely in favor of strict prohibition, enforcement of the Volstead act and maintenance of the Constitution."

THE PROGRESS OF SOCIAL MORALITY EDUCATION

NATIONAL AND STATE WORKERS REPORT INCREASING RECOGNITION OF THE IMPORTANCE OF SUCH INSTRUCTION

Martha P. Falconer, Associate Director

The Indiana W. C. T. U. is well pleased with the excellent work of Miss Grace Leigh Scott, who spent five consecutive days in Clinton County. "She has a great message and tells it convincingly, carrying her audience with her," writes Mrs. Carrie Brinkhoff, state recording secretary.

"In my home town we had a public meeting in one of the churches. Many lingered for questions and answers. In the evening she addressed an open air community meeting with an audience of eight hundred. Her work has been the talk of the town. I am sure no union, state, county, or local, could render greater service than to engage Miss Scott for work. She possesses a delightful personality, makes a fine appearance, and above all presents this vital subject in a vital manner."

A signal victory for the cause of social morality has been won in the recognition given the work of Dr. Sina Stratton, superintendent of Moral Education for the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., by the Department of Education of the state of Pennsylvania. A course of seven lectures will be given in each Normal school in the state by, or under the direction of, Dr. Stratton. They are to form a part of the regular curriculum; a sufficient number of hours will be allowed for lectures and for research work, and the usual number of credits for that amount of work will be given.

This victory has not been won without effort. For several years Dr. Stratton has worked with this end in view. In the beginning, she was permitted to give a course of seven lectures in each of three Normal schools. The work was done outside of school hours, financed entirely by the state W. C. T. U., and no credits were allowed. The results were so satisfactory that the experiment was repeated in all the Normal schools of the state. Later, the course was reduced to four lectures. One year of this proved so unsatisfactory that, after a conference of the leading educators of the state, it was decided to adopt Dr. Stratton's original plan of seven lectures and to give her work official recognition as a part of the regular Normal school course.

What Dr. Stratton has accomplished in Pennsylvania, can be done in other states. Similar courses are being given in many of the large colleges, and they should be given in every college and in every Normal school. Where nothing in this line is being done, the W. C. T. U. should make an effort to have it introduced, and where a beginning has been made, the work should be aided and encouraged by state and local unions. Our state superintendents of Social Morality, and our state lecturers, are endeavoring to have the importance of this work recognized. Where public interest is lacking, the services of our national lecturer should be used to stimulate it. We must work for the recognition of sex instruction as a part of the regular school course, but before this will be given, demand for it must be created. What parents want will be put into the public schools. When boards of education demand teachers with some training in sex education, no college or Normal school will graduate students without this requirement. Every mother desires proper sex instruction for her child and she knows that, to safeguard her child, other children should have the same instruction. The work of the department of Social Morality lies largely with the individual mother but we must not lose sight of the greater issue—public recognition of the importance of sex instruction and the need of teachers properly trained to carry on this work.

Prayer the Key-note of Indianapolis W. C. T. U. Americanization Center

Miss Pruden, Supervisor

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

We believe He either sends, or permits, certain happenings in our lives for an all-wise purpose. Some people need to be found by others, or to really discover themselves. And so we are sure there was no mistake about the blessing that came to a whole community when little Arthur was taken suddenly ill. He is one of a family of six children whose parents came to this country from sunny Italy. Prosperity smiled on them and they were very happy until the father one day lost his job. For four months in the winter they struggled along. Their little savings were exhausted, the rent long past due, the gas had been shut off, and one small basket given by charity each week constituted their only supplies.

We had never been able to win the confidence of Italian people. The answer to an invitation to the center was always "T'ank you, Miss, I come;" but no one ever did! It seemed they were a separate group and did not care to be friendly with those of the other nine nationalities in our territory. We had made the matter a subject of prayer, feeling sure God would unlock the door of opportunity, that we might enter.

Arthur's family was among the number who had said: "We have no need of the W. C. T. U. Neighbors." But Arthur is unconscious. He does not open his eyes as loved ones beg him to do. His fever grows higher and something must be done. Would the W. C. T. U. Neighbors across the street telephone for a doctor? The father came timidly to ask the favor, and immediately man's extremity became God's opportunity. A physician from the dispensary could not be secured, so we sent for another. Then we learned about conditions in this home. We were able to have filled the prescriptions left by the physician and to get some nourishing food from the Lord's treasury (tithes). This gave a chance to teach the lesson that one-tenth of our income belongs to God, and that the receiver should give thanks to God, not to us, for help received.

In the morning, the little lad was better and the parents were sure his life was saved by the timely help given. The father pleaded for work. He did not want charity, he wanted to support his family, so when two of our loyal white ribboners visited his home and saw the real need there, they sought his former employer. He told them that the man was a fine workman but on account of an ungovernable temper he had discharged him and this record kept him from finding employment elsewhere. W. C. T. U. women know not the word "defeat" in a worthy cause; they begged that the man be given one more chance for the sake of his suffering wife and little children, then they went home to pray. Prayer changes things, and in a few days the old job was restored, greatly to the surprise of this family which as yet knew not the worth of petition. But it was now easy to teach them not only to thank God for his gifts but to ask Him to meet their needs.

Very soon there was a transformation in the lives and surroundings of this sorely distressed family. They had found real friends in the women wearing the little white bow. Although the mother understands little English, she feels the influence of love and song and prayer, and every Sunday finds her and her children, neatly dressed, in attendance at the Americanization Sunday school. The oldest girl was given a Testament and for the first time herself read God's word. The truths took hold of her in such a way that she would ask us to explain certain portions. We are praying that she will have a real Christian experience and be a missionary among her own people. The doors of every Italian home now swing open to us. Many of the mothers come to the Center to enjoy our activities, and send the children to the L. T. L. and Sunday school.

This is only one of the many interesting opportunities to do real missionary work at our very doors, and I wonder if little Arthur will ever know how God used him to answer our prayers and bring about the change that has brought happiness to many other lives.

Baltimore Community House Brightens Lives of Many Women and Children

At this W. C. T. U. Community House, a center for Americanization work, located at 126 South High Street, Southeast Baltimore, live Italians, Lithuanians and Hebrews.

On the second floor of the building, which does not appear in the picture shown on our cover page, are two large kindergarten rooms. The cement basement is equipped with gas range, dish closet, sink, and long tables from which soup is served to the little folks at the close of the school session.

The meeting of the boys' and girls' and mothers' clubs are held on the first floor, also a serving class for girls, and a class in craft work for both boys and girls, the latter conducted by the North Baltimore union.

In the doorway, left to right, are Miss Bertha Kyle, state superintendent of Americanization, Maryland W. C. T. U., Mrs. Helena Brown, director of Boys' and Girls' Clubs, Baltimore W. C. T. U., Miss Laura Wagner, Y. P. B. superintendent, Baltimore W. C. T. U. (also volunteer teacher in the Americanization department.) Seated on the steps is Miss Therese Wedekind, volunteer teacher.

The picture was taken at the close of a mothers' meeting, not so largely attended as usual, and the bouquets were furnished by Mrs. Brown, who has access to the fields and woods, and delights to carry a bit of nature's beauty into the sordid lives of these down-town friends.

W. C. T. U. SPEAKERS FROM THE UNITED STATES CARRY ANTI-ALCOHOL MESSAGE TO OTHER LANDS

Mary Harris Armor

Mary Harris Armor in New Zealand

Mrs. Mary Harris Armor sailed from San Francisco for New Zealand on August 4. She goes at the urgent invitation of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Zealand, to help in the campaign for national prohibition that is now in progress and will culminate in December in a popular vote on the question. Indispensable as is our gifted evangel of prohibition to the United States in its present campaign for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, it was felt that she ought to be spared for a few months to help our comrades across the Pacific. Mrs. Armor is equipped with volumes of testimony of prominent American citizens witnessing to the value of prohibition to the home, civic and economic life of the country. In her inimitable way she will drive these facts into the consciousness of New Zealanders, and convince them that a policy that has been so advantageous to the United States ought to be adopted in New Zealand.

It will be remembered that New Zealand voted on national prohibition in December, 1919, at which time three propositions were presented, with the following result:

For national continuance 241,251
For state purchase and control ..32,261
For national prohibition 270,250

The condition attached to this vote was that any issue should be declared carried if it received a majority of the total votes cast, and that in the event of no issue being carried, the liquor trade should continue. This year the poll is to be taken on the same conditions, with the three propositions as given above, so that in order to win a victory there must be a sufficient number of votes cast for national prohibition to beat the other two propositions combined. In 1919 the dry measure lost by a very narrow majority, only a little over 1,000 votes. While the conditions imposed are unfair it was the best that could be secured from the government and are better than the old three-fifths majority provision handicap formerly imposed.

Sentiment for prohibition has been growing since 1919, and the drys are hoping and expecting a victory when the ballots at the December election are counted.

Deborah Knox Livingston in South Africa

Clippings from the newspapers and magazines of South Africa received at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters testify to the success of Mrs. Livingston's temperance tour of South Africa, as do the reports from our W. C. T. U. comrades in that country. The South Africa Lady's Pictorial, a high class magazine, says, "The woman's movement has received a wonderful impetus during the visit of the great American speaker, Mrs. Livingston." In a copy of the Bloemfontein Friend, we note alongside a rather elaborate display advertisement of "The National Beverage, 'Castle Lager,'" an editorial on "Prohibition in America." The editor admits that it is somewhat difficult to say whether those who attended the meeting at which the W. C. T. U. representative spoke were more impressed by her rare gift of speech or by the simple grandeur of the story of America's renunciation of the drink traffic, and the magnificent decision of one hundred and ten millions of people to prohibit the manufacture, sale, exportation, importation and transportation of alcoholic beverages. "Whatever may be said by propagandists to the contrary," remarks the editor, "whatever half truths may be circulated through the press and other media, the accumulating weight of all the evidence that reaches South Africa is that the United States is really a prohibition country and intends to remain so. Indeed, it would now be almost impossible to have the Eighteenth Amendment rescinded.

"Far from America going back on what it has done so deliberately and after years of experience, the probability is that its example will be followed by other countries—and that in the comparatively near future."

Lydia B. Johnson

Deborah K. Livingston

Lydia B. Johnson in Sweden

A plebiscite on national prohibition of alcoholic beverages is to be taken in Sweden on August 27 of this year. In order that the Riksdag, the national law-making body, may learn the relative attitude of men and women on this subject, the votes are to be counted separately. It is believed that the women will be a large factor in polling a big majority for prohibition. The movement for prohibition has been gaining strength through recent years, and has the support of Premier Branting and many other prominent officials and men of affairs.

Mrs. Lydia B. Johnson, of South Dakota, who helped among the Swedish people in the prohibition campaigns in Oklahoma and Nebraska, is doing some special work in this campaign, as the representative of the United States W. C. T. U. She is telling the story of prohibition in America to large and enthusiastic audiences, and so effective are her words that the opposition has employed some of their strongest speakers to follow her and endeavor to counteract her influence.

On a recent Sunday afternoon, while a gentle summer rain was falling, she addressed an audience of 2,000 people in the open air. At the close of the first half hour she asked the people if they would like to have her close the meeting. From all sides came the answer, "No, no, keep on" and not one person in the audience withdrew until she finished, when she was greeted with cries of "Bravo" and ringing applause. She writes that as a result of the experience, from the rim of her real Parisian hat rain drops were trickling to her shoulders!

Mr. Alexis Bjorkman, who was sent to the United States to study the results of prohibition, spoke at a meeting with Mrs. Johnson, and on the occasion said, "The American women will never permit the liquor traffic to be returned to the United States, nor will they allow any modification of the Volstead Law."

DEPARTMENT OF CHILD WELFARE

Elizabeth A. Perkins, Director

Children and young men and women acquire the alcohol habit through drinking wines and beer. They do not BEGIN with the stronger drinks. Pray on, work on, vote on, Fathers and Mothers, and DO NOT ALLOW the Volstead Act to be weakened to permit the manufacture and sale of wines and beer.

MESSAGES FROM THE STATES

LAW ENFORCEMENT ESSAYS—ESTABLISHMENT OF BABY AND MATERNITY CLINICS—OUT-DOOR MEETINGS—A BABY WEEK—SPECIAL TRAINING COURSE FOR BIG SISTERS

MISSOURI

The Missouri W. C. T. U. has been asked by Dr. Irl Krause, director division of Child Hygiene, Missouri state board of health, to become its official co-operative agent in establishing baby clinics for maternity care and instruction. The aim is to establish these clinics in at least fifteen counties before January first.

The local unions are to be asked to make the pre-arrangements for securing the assistance of physicians and nurses and the co-operation of other women's organizations. Missouri W. C. T. U. will carry on, with great zeal and enthusiasm, this definite Child Welfare work.

MICHIGAN

Hundreds of essays were written by the public school children of Michigan in the recent law enforcement prize essay contest. "Believing that proper respect for law and the enforcement of law is one of the great needs of these times, this series of prize essays was planned."

The essays showed remarkable clearness of thought; that obedience to law should begin in the home, and that all laws of state and country should be obeyed. Every essay proved that the children and high school pupils entering the contest believed in the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution and that it should be enforced.

Who can estimate the good which has been accomplished for future homes, for the state and for America by bringing to the attention of these children in the public schools such great topics as "The Majesty of the Law," "Why I Love America, Observe Its Constitution and Obey Its laws," "To Be a Good American, One Must Obey the Law." For the sake of America's children we urge every state to have similar essay contests.

Through the state Child Welfare superintendent, Mrs. Mildred Hubbell, Michigan reports, for the year, one-hundred-twenty-one regular meetings devoted wholly or in part to Child Welfare, sixty-five special Child Welfare meetings and one-hundred-twenty-four Mothers' Meetings. Exhibits have been placed in fifty-three places.

RHODE ISLAND

The state superintendent of Child Welfare, Mrs. Arthur Smith, held a most delightful outdoor meeting at her beautiful home in Barrington, June 30, the national director of Child Welfare and Mrs. Olive Barnes, president of West Virginia W. C. T. U., being the honored guests.

MAINE

Under the direction of Mrs. Annie M. R. Barnes, state superintendent of Child Welfare, a most successful Child Welfare and Baby Week has been held in Houlton. The week began Sunday, July 9, the pastors preaching on Child Welfare on Sunday morning and a great outdoor mass meeting taking place in Monument Park on Sunday evening.

Every day of the Baby Week was attended with special features which included, besides the weighing and measuring of babies and small children, a baby parade, Moral Education Day, special addresses by members of the state board of health, daily showing of health pictures at picture theaters, and on Friday evening the W. C. T. U. Child Welfare pageant, "The Child in the Midst."

A splendid exhibit had been furnished by the National W. C. T. U. department of Child Welfare, and other posters were provided by the Maine state board of health. Houlton merchants contributed the prizes for the children scoring the highest points, and the Houlton newspaper gave large space to the work. It was a gala time for Houlton and for the national director, who was privileged to be present, and it brought to the parents of the children great messages on child life, health messages, moral messages, spiritual messages.

OHIO

The Big Sisters to Expectant Mothers in Toledo (about two hundred) will be taught nursing and first care of babies that they may be efficient and trained helpers in emergency cases. This special course will be given by one of the Big Sisters, who is a trained nurse, and will include most of the instruction given in the first year of a nurse's training course.

WEST VIRGINIA

Through the generosity of the state superintendent, Mrs. V. E. Mohler, a large collection of Child Welfare charts and posters has been presented by the W. C. T. U. to the extension division of Agriculture, University of West Virginia. These charts are being used in the girls' camps this summer.

To Every Child Belongs the Right

- To be well born
- To be educated
- To be protected from child-labor
- To be morally safeguarded
- To be spiritually trained

Questions answered by the Iowa Child Research Station:

1. At what age do adolescent boys and girls mature?

Ans. There is no one age. Girls mature about two years earlier than boys. Some girls mature as early as eleven years, others as late as seventeen. Some boys mature at twelve, others not until sixteen or seventeen.

2. Are tall children or short children older in physiological age?

Ans. Tall children mature earlier than short ones, and are physiologically older.

3. Is a child's maturity determined by his height or weight?

Ans. It is determined by the relation between the height and weight.

4. Is physiological development related to mental development?

Ans. Yes, children who are physically superior are usually mentally superior.

5. Should children be promoted in school on account of brightness alone?

Ans. No, the physiological age, the social age, and the mental development, as well as the educational attainment, should be taken into consideration.

6. From the standpoint of education, when is the most important period in the life of a child?

Ans. The first two or three years are now considered the most important.

7. When does the birth length of a child double?

Ans. Six years.

8. How much has the weight increased?

Ans. Four times.

9. Why is it important to know the length of a child at birth?

Ans. If the child is relatively long at birth he will be relatively tall at twelve years, eighteen years, and during adult life.

10. What are the three fundamental emotions which a baby may show?

Ans. Fear, rage and love.

11. When does a baby begin to talk in sentences?

Ans. About the second year.

12. What are hereditary factors?

Ans. Hereditary factors are elements which are passed down unchanged from parent to offspring. When different varieties of plants or animals are crossed these factors are combined in new ways and produce variations.

13. Who was Mendel?

Ans. Mendel was an Austrian monk who in 1870 discovered the law of heredity, which bears his name.

14. What is the Mendelian law?

Ans. The Mendelian law defines the principles of separation and recombination of hereditary factors from generation to generation.

BEFORE AND AFTER PROHIBITION IN MASSACHUSETTS

A study of the public records of the state of Massachusetts, comparing the last two years under prohibition with the pre-prohibition years, is one of the latest contributions to the vast mass of evidence of the value of the Eighteenth Amendment to the social and economic life of the nation. This comparison has been made by Cora Frances Stoddard and is most interesting in its conclusions. It appears in the June special survey number of the Scientific Temperance Journal. We quote from the summary:

The information in this study covers the principal phases of human life revealed in public documents. It relates to the great chapters of public disorder, crime, sickness and morality, conditions of women and children, thrift and poverty in a leading industrial state and its capital city for ten years. It includes the most eventful period in the world's history and its attendant social and economic changes. The report places side by side conditions in two periods of business depression.

It shows that when the year 1921 is compared with the period of seven successive non-prohibition years in the decade, in more than three-quarters of the items tabulated, the figures for 1921 are either the most favorable of the decade, or better than any of the "wet" years, or better than the average of the wet years. In all but less than a dozen the average for the two dry years is conspicuously better than the average for the wet years, and the difference in these few cases was so small as to be practically negligible except in one instance, the Boston City Hospital, which will be mentioned later. Arrests for all causes, for drunkenness, for serious offenses, despite unemployment and unrest following the war, were all far lower (from 12 to 69 per cent.) than in the wet period either absolutely or in proportion to the population.

The population of the various penal institutions was from 9 to 64 per cent. lower in 1921 than in the average wet year. The total population in all penal institutions of Massachusetts, Sept. 30, 1921, was 3,252 as compared with an average of 5,839 in the seven wet years.

Making all allowance for changing methods of dealing with offenders, it appears that the decrease in drunkenness and accompanying offenses had a preponderating influence in the special decrease in prison population in 1920 and 1921.

Women and Children Offenders Decrease

The number of women and children caught in the machinery of the law has markedly fallen. Fewer women arrested for all causes and for drunkenness, only 314 women in the penal institutions of the state, Sept. 30, 1921, as compared to an average of 732 in the seven wet years or 839 in the preceding hard-times year of 1915. Arrests for offenses against chastity in Boston were 1,881 in 1921, a smaller number than in any of the seven wet years. The number of children under fifteen years of age arrested in Boston was the smallest of the decade, 600 fewer than the wet years' average. There was the smallest total of arrests of neglected and delinquent children in Boston (2,442), a decrease of almost 700 from the wet years' average of 3,124; the fewest cases (save in 1916) begun in the decade in the Boston Juvenile Court, 878; the wet years' average was 1,072. Probation officers ascribe the improvement to the improved conditions in the homes due to prohibition. Parental drunkenness is nearly absent in cases of dependent and neglected children given into care of the Boston Child Welfare Division.

Improvement in Home Conditions

Statistics are confirmed by the experience of the Boston Family Welfare Society, that found in a hundred new cases only about four cases (4.1) where intemperance was a conspicuous factor in 1922 as compared with twenty-seven (27) in 1917. Gain is confirmed by the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children whose records for 1916 and 1921 showed in 1921 a decrease of two-thirds in the proportion of cases in which intemperance was an important factor in cruelty to or neglect of children. The contribution to integrity of the home appears in this society's record of 144 alcoholic families from which in 1916 four times as many children were removed as were returned; since prohibition came, twice as many have been returned as removed.

Massachusetts and Boston have shared with the rest of the country the remarkable decline in general and infant mortality which began in 1919.

The extent to which prohibition has contributed directly or indirectly can not be estimated, but its influence is clearly traceable in certain classes of mortality. This effect in some cases may be due to decreased drinking; in some to the improvement in food, care, home surroundings, recreation, freedom from worry following improved economic conditions resulting from saving money formerly spent for drink. It will be understood that the influence of all movements for promoting public health are recognized as factors in many of those gains and that no claim is made that prohibition is the sole cause, except as it touches cases where alcohol is unquestionably the chief conspicuous cause of sickness or mortality.

Deaths from Alcoholism

The deaths from alcoholism in Boston were the lowest of the decade in 1921 except for 1919 and 1920, both prohibition or part prohibition years, 70 deaths in 1921 against the wet years' average of 134. The number of deaths from accidents was the smallest of the decade; of homicides, one less than the wet years' average. There were 102 suicides; the average number in the wet years was 126; in the previous hard times year, the number was 140. The 694 alcoholics admitted to the Washingtonian Home in 1921 represent a genuine gain over the average of 955 admissions in the seven wet years, during which an equal number was entering the doors of the former state inebriate hospital now used by the Federal government for the injured soldiers. There were also 11 small private institutions in Massachusetts for the treatment of alcoholics. All but three of the latter are now closed. As long as the old drinkers continue to drink, it will not be surprising if the Washingtonian Home, in the absence of the other former institutions, receives a considerable number of alcoholics who, formerly, might have gone to the state or private hospitals, and so continues to have a fairly large number of admissions.

Mortality from cirrhosis of the liver furnishes contributory health evidence of prohibition benefits. In 1921 there were approximately but three-fifths as many deaths from cirrhosis of the liver in both Boston and Massachusetts as in the average wet year. The tuberculosis death rate in both city and state reached in 1921 its lowest point and prohibition is named among the contributing causes.

Alcoholic insanity ("alcoholic psychoses") was responsible for but 151 first admissions to public institutions for the insane and McLean Hospital in 1921; there was an annual average of 340 in the seven wet years. The total number of first admissions of all insane was the lowest since 1912 except for 1920, also a prohibition year. Alcoholic insanity was responsible for 10.3 per cent of first admissions in the average wet year; the dry years' average was 4.24 per cent.

Pauperism Drops

Poverty and pauperism returns so far as available show a marked improvement over the wet period. After a winter (1921) when unemployment had been the worst since 1915, the state, cities', and town almshouses had, March 31, 1921, the smallest population of the decade and only about half the average for the wet years which included three years of full employment and higher wages. Outside relief by cities and towns was given in 1921 in nearly 10,000 fewer cases than the average for the wet years, and in 34,000 fewer cases than in the year including the hard winter of 1915. Outside relief was given by the state in more cases than for several years, but the number fell by 2,400 below the 1915 figures, and represented only 543 persons assisted per 100,000 population as compared with 638 in 1915.

The Family Welfare Society cared for 4,154 families in the year ending April 30, 1922. Though this was a larger number than in several preceding years, it was nearly 700 fewer than the 4,847 families cared for in the previous hard times year of 1915.

The few instances of an increase in numbers in 1921 over the wet period outside those already mentioned include the deaths from homicide in Massachusetts which, however, were but four more in 1921 than the average for the wet years and were fewer than in 1913, 1915, and 1916. The average number of homicides for the two years 1920 and 1921 was 11 per cent lower than the average for the seven wet years.

The population in the State Infirmary, November 30, 1921, total (2,354) exceeded by 117 the average for 1912-17, but it was lower than in 1914 and 1915.

When the average of the two prohibition years, 1920 and 1921, is compared with the average for the seven wet years

Evidence is Accumulating

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, President-Emeritus Harvard University

Evidence has accumulated on every hand that prohibition has promoted public health, public happiness and industrial efficiency. This evidence comes from manufacturers, physicians, nurses of all sorts, school, factory, hospital and district, and from social workers of many races and religions laboring daily in a great variety of fields. This testimony also demonstrates beyond a doubt that prohibition is actually sapping the terrible force of disease, poverty, crime and vice. These results are obtained in spite of the imperfect enforcement, in some communities, of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

From a letter sent Feb. 12, 1922, to be read at a hearing before the Committee on Legal Affairs of the Massachusetts legislature on a bill providing a state prohibition enforcement code.

The Source of Your Information, Please, Major Appleton?

Major General Daniel Appleton is asking for 1,000 women recruits for an Anti-Volstead Army. He declares that "mothers in many parts of the country are against prohibition and that women who once were not interested in whether or not they had the franchise, today are anxious to use their votes against prohibition."

Major Appleton does not divulge the source of his information as to the sudden turning of women against the dry law. He certainly cannot claim that it is the LEAGUE of WOMEN VOTERS, who are outspoken for the Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Code, and in the different states are working for the election of dry Congressmen. Its president, Mrs. Maud Wood Park, says: "The mothers of the nation are no more likely to wipe out the Eighteenth Amendment than they are to demand the cultivation of typhoid germs in the water supplies science has purified."

He cannot base his statement on the attitude of the YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, with its branches honey-combing the nation, for at its recent national convention it went on record for the strictest enforcement of the law.

He has no support of his assertion from the large company of women in the MISSIONARY SOCIETIES of the Protestant churches, for from first to last, and at the present time, they have been and are heartily in favor of the continuance and enforcement of the national prohibitory law.

Had he in mind the members of the NATIONAL BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION when he made the charge, he will find it contradicted by the president of that fine organization, Mrs. Lena Lake Forrest, who says, "Every thinking woman knows that prohibition is for the good of the country," and "Of course the business world strongly favors it because of added efficiency."

If he imagines he can substantiate his statement by crediting it to the women of the labor unions of the country, let us remind him that at its very recent national convention, the NATIONAL WOMEN'S TRADE UNION passed strong resolutions "unequivocally for enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment through the laws passed by Congress for this purpose."

He will get little comfort from learning that the great nation-wide body, the Mothers' Congress and Parent-Teachers' Association, includes in its legislative program, "Prohibition—no change in the Volstead Act which would readmit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement."

Had the Major been at Chautauqua, New York, at the biennial convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, representing a membership of 2,000,000 of the most influential women in the United States, and noted the unanimity of the vote on the resolution for national prohibition, he would have given a sober second thought before he said that the women were anxious to vote wet. Those resolutions represent the sentiments of the intelligent womanhood of America:

"Whereas, the people of the United States have attempted to suppress the age-long evil of the liquor traffic by constitutional amendment and

"Whereas, such constitutional amendment cannot be enforced except through legislation enacted for that special purpose, therefore be it,

"Resolved, that the Federation of Women's Clubs support legislation which will when enforced carry out the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution. And because reverence for law and obedience to law are fundamental to stable government and a well ordered society, we appeal to our representatives in Congress, and the state legislatures, our executives and judicial officers and every citizen to co-operate in the thorough-going enforcement of the measure enacted to make the Eighteenth Amendment effective."

One more fact would we bring to the attention of Major Appleton—the action taken last November at the meeting in Philadelphia of the National Council of Women, representing over thirty national organizations of women, with a total membership of approximately 11,000,000. At that gathering a resolution endorsing national prohibition, and urging co-operation in its enforcement was unanimously passed.

All the evidence seems to be against the Major's prediction.

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES AND OTHER INFLUENTIAL ORGANIZATIONS

W. C. T. U. speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

(Through your local papers give wide-spread publicity to the resolutions thus secured.)

Taking a "Pointer" From the Other Side

As the time approches when the nation will once more express its desires at the ballot box, the fight daily becomes hotter and hotter, and the attacks upon prohibition more and more vicious. One need only learn of some of the tactics being used by the wet organizations to circumvent the drys, to realize quite clearly certain points in connection with the struggle.

Perhaps the first thing that occurs to the mind as one studies the education (?) propaganda being put forth by "our friend, the enemy" is that they make it fairly easy to account for the many articles purporting to treat the subject from a totally disinterested point of view, yet speaking of it in a distinctly derogatory way, which find their way into periodicals and some of the papers. If only the world at large realized the true source of this publicity, its effect would be greatly minimized, to say the least. Another thing which attracts one's attention is that the campaign against prohibition is not being conducted in any hit-or-miss fashion, but along carefully thought-out lines, according to definite plans. It may readily be seen, moreover, that the more than forty organizations which, under various nomenclatures, are in the fight, are strongly united in the one purpose of bringing back wine and beer.

In their propaganda, in their carefully conducted campaign, and in their united purpose lie the strength and the hope of the anti-prohibitionists. And the fact that the temperance forces have ever reason to feel that because they are on the side of righteousness they must finally win, by no means lessens the grave necessity for vigilance and toil. Let not the foes of prohibition outdo us in effort. We might, with good effect, adopt some of their tactics by using as ammunition the material furnished in this and other issues of THE UNION SIGNAL.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922
NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 17-19, 1922.

TRANSPORTATION NOTES
WORLD'S AND NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

A convention rate of one full fare going and one half-fare returning has been granted by all railroads for the World's and National W. C. T. U. conventions to be held in Philadelphia, Novemmer 11-19. Tickets may be purchased November 8 to 14. Validated certificates will be honored at Philadelphia for return tickets at the reduced fares up to and including December 1, 1922.

All reduced fare return tickets issued on properly validated certificates will be good leaving Philadelphia at any time up to December 1, and will bear final limit computed from that date, as for example, Philadelphia to Chicago the final limit shown in the ticket would be December 3, 1922, by which date the passenger would have to reach Chicago.

Stop-overs will be allowed at regular stop-over points not to exceed ten days within final limit of return tickets, and as stop-overs are allowed at either Buffalo or Niagara Falls, any of those in attendance at the Philadelphia meeting who desire to attend the World League Against Alcoholism, meeting at Toronto, Ont., November 24-29, may do so if before leaving Philadelphia they have their certificates validated, and honored for return tickets and stop-over at Buffalo or Niagara Falls as outlined.

It must be clearly understood that only those traveling via Buffalo or Niagara Falls on the going trip may obtain reduced fare tickets returning via either of these points, since the return tickets must be issued via the same route as used on the going trip.

Tickets must be deposited with agents at Buffalo or Niagara Falls immediately upon arrival in order to obtain the stop-overs.

ELIZABETH NEWMAN,
Secretary Transportation Committee.

Noted Worker Among Nurses Passes On

Miss Ellen B. Bradley, R. N., assistant superintendent of the department of Medical Temperance for both the World's and National W. C. T. U., was called to her great reward on July 26. Miss Bradley's work in the department was mainly with nurses, as she was herself a trained nurse of large experience. She wrote for nurses' magazines and other journals, many articles against the use of alcoholic liquors as medicine. At first these articles were not well received by some editors of nurses' journals, but of late years they were welcomed and approved. Miss Bradley was at many national conventions of nurses, and gave out large numbers of department leaflets. When she was unable to attend these gatherings she arranged for some other nurse, friendly to our cause, to attend to the distribution of the leaflets which Mrs. M. M. Allen, World's and National W. C. T. U. superintendent, donated. She was in this work faithful to the end, for on her death bed she secured from a Brooklyn nurse a promise to care for the leaflets for the convention held recently in Seattle.

Miss Bradley was a member for years of the Port Richmond (S. I.) W. C. T. U., and retained her membership there for some time after removing to Brooklyn. So great was her interest in the drug question, that several years ago she took a position in Bellevue Hospital that she might learn more of the condition of addicts as treated there. Her subsequent lectures on this topic of drug addiction, and her written articles, showed careful, intelligent study.

Her funeral was attended by many white ribboners. Mrs. Ella A. Boole represented the state and National W. C. T. U.

Special Train

The National W. C. T. U. has made arrangements with the Pennsylvania Railroad to run a "Special Train" on account of National and World's Conventions at Philadelphia. This will leave Chicago 10:15 a. m., November 10.

Reservations should be made through W. E. Blachley, Division Passenger Agent, 323 S. Wells St., Chicago, Ill.

World's W. C. T. U. Notes

The latest organization to affiliate with the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the Ulster (Ireland) Women's Temperance Council, with a membership of 5,000. This is the second national group in Ireland auxiliary to the World's organization. Miss Hill of Dublin is the president of the W. C. T. U. of that country.

The white ribboners of Scotland are planning for another no-license campaign in 1923, and are already raising funds to carry it on. Scotland has a membership of 61,502, with 2,337 associates. The work is well organized and great enthusiasm prevails for the next campaign.

Mrs. David Lloyd George, wife of the prime minister of England, in replying to an invitation extended to her to attend the World's Convention in Philadelphia, expresses her regret that she cannot come to the great meeting. Mrs. Lloyd George has for many years been an ardent temperance worker and white ribboner, and has done much organizing in Wales for the British Women's Temperance Association.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Listen!

Among the things that this day brings
Will come to you a call,
Which unless you are listening,
You may not hear at all;
Lest it be very soft and low,
Whate'er you do, where'er you go,
Be listening.

It may be that a little child
Whom you shall meet to-day
Is dropping tears of baby grief
That you can wipe away.
O, if the call should come to you
So sweet a service thus to do,
Be listening.

It may be but to clasp a hand,
Where such a clasp is needed;
It may be you can warn a soul,
Where counsel goes unheeded;
O, lest to-day this call should come,
Awake, asleep, abroad, at home,
Be listening.

It may be—hardest task of all—
To stand from out God's way
While others rightly do the work
Wherein you failed to-day;
But if the call should e'en be this,
Think only that the call is His,
Be listening.

Then whatsoe'er the call may be,
To service small or great,
To cross the seas and speak God's love,
To smile, to rule a State—
When God shall come and say to you,
Here is the thing that you must do,
Be listening.

REST COTTAGE

RED LETTER DAYS

August 28—(Birthday of Lucy Webb Hayes).
September 28—Children's Harvest Home (Birthday of Frances E. Willard).

World's and National W. C. T. U. Convention Headquarters

The Bellevue-Stratford, Broad and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia, is located in the center of the city, convenient to the leading stores, theaters, and railroads, and will be the headquarters of the World's W. C. T. U. Executive Committee and as many delegates and visitors as can be accommodated. Rates are quoted as follows:

Single rooms without bath, $4 and $6 per day. (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person.)

Single rooms with bath $5 and $6 per day (inside). (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person.)

Single rooms with bath, outside, $7 to $9 per day.

Double room and bath (with outlook), $9 to $11 per day.

Room with twin beds and bath (open court), $8 and $9 per day.

Large double room with twin beds and bath, $10 to $13 per day.

Two rooms and intervening bath on open court (two persons), $9 per day. (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person in room.)

Two outside rooms with intervening bath (two persons), $13 per day. (Additional charge of $2 for each extra person in room.)

HAVE YOU DONE IT?

Have you sent for your stickers, to use on letters, cards, books, trunks, suitcases, etc. Hurry up—time is flying! Price, per 1,000, $2.00; per 500, $1.25; 125 for 50 cents. Send to

Mrs. James B. Scott, 503 South 46th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Music the Meeting Place

As previously announced, the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. has engaged the Academy of Music in Philadelphia for the World's Convention. This historic building has a seating capacity of about 3,600.

Mrs. Leah Cobb Marion, treasurer of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., writes that no more reservations for seats will be sold. It is estimated that, counting the gallery, which is always filled on important occasions, there will be about eight hundred free seats.

Notes on Entertainment

We are being asked by delegates the location of hotels in the vicinity of the Academy. The Bellevue-Stratford is one-half block north on Broad street; the Stenton one-half block south and on the opposite side of Broad street; Hotel Walton is just across Broad from the Academy; the Lorraine, seven blocks north; the Majestic nine, both on Broad street with a trolley car on 13th and 15th streets; Hotel Colonnade two and one-half blocks; St. James one and one-half blocks. The Longacre is less than one block away; the Aldine, six; the Belgravia, five; while the Normandie is twenty-three blocks from the Academy, the latter a direct, quick ride on one line of cars. The Y. W. C. A. Central, 18th and Arch St., is seven blocks distant and the League's Branch but one and one-half. The Y. W. C. A.'s do not entertain many transients.

Because of a feeling among the delegates that our hotel rates are high, we are arranging for lodging and breakfast in private homes at $1.00 per day, but since the Academy is in the center of the business section, these homes are necessarily some distance away, generally from one-half to three-quarters of an hour's ride, and sometimes on two lines of cars, so that delegates asking for this kind of entertainment will please be prepared for the distance. This committee is well organized and desires to make all reservations at the hotels and homes, using for confirmation of assignments return postal cards, which will be the guarantee to both parties. We will consider it no trouble at all to place satisfactorily all delegates and vistors for either or both conventions. Our one desire is to serve and please you well.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

New York Y. P. B. Convention Emphasizes Responsibilities of Young People

Special Correspondence

Characterized by a deep spiritual note that predicts success for the future, the Y. P. B. convention of New York state showed marked progress in many lines. The more than two hundred twenty delegates from all parts of the state, through yells, songs and enthusiasm, made the halls of Cook Academy ring with their expressions of victory.

The character talks each morning by Dr. Clarence Paul McClelland, president of Drew Seminary for Girls at Carmel, gave the keynote for the day and will find expression in the lives of the hearers all during the year. Interest reached a high pitch during the reports of the state corresponding secretary, Miss Marguerite Funston, and the state treasurer, Miss Maude Pratt, as they recounted the achievements of the year and the delegates recognized that their Branch was a prize-winner. The silver loving cup, awarded the Branch that scores the highest in the president's efficiency plan, went to one of the newer Branches, Haskinsville. Our contributions to the national funds were most gratifying, the Branch having sent $181 for the Y. P. B. Missionary Fund; $90 to the Willard Memorial and $60 to the Stevens Legislative Fund. The balance left to start the work for the new year was over $600.

Seventy-seven graduates in the study course, under the direction of Vice-president Harry G. Guthmann, greeted Miss Anna A. Gordon, national president, and Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Young People's Branch general secretary. This was the largest class in our history. As these young people listened to an address by the national president, and received from her hands their diplomas, they realized that they had a large part in the task of building a better citizenry for this nation.

Eight young people were recognized as especially prepared for leadership, having met the standard for personal efficiency as outlined by President Dunn. Each received from the state federation a handsome pin which proclaims them expert members.

Two original "three minute contests" provoked much interest. Contestants wrote their own selections, most of these dealing with the value of the Young People's Branch. The second contest was among local presidents. THE UNION SIGNAL was awarded to those who were adjudged winners.

No convention was ever graced with more distinguished guests; Miss Gordon and Mrs. Perkins, our very own, came to us from a group of other conventions. Dr. Clarence True Wilson, secretary of the board of temperance for the Methodist Church, delivered the address at the Sunday evening mass meeting. Mr. Charles Carlton, secretary for the Y. M. C. A. of Syracuse University, delivered the annual sermon, in which he urged the young people to go forth in faith believing that theirs is a special work. "A New Fourth of July" was the theme of a spirited talk by Rev. George Fowler of Buffalo, who came to us by courtesy of the Anti-Saloon League. Prof. Louis Wilson, vice-president of Cook Academy, in a masterful presentation on "Christianity's Unanswerable Arguments," proved that the young people were inheritors of a wonderful past.

"Of the first importance" were the department plans as presented by each of the women heading her special line of work. In a spirited appeal, Miss Rebecca Rhoads, national superintendent of Social Welfare, made us feel our duty to the men who served us in the great war. Mrs. Margaret Wenzel, superintendent for New York, was sure the Anti-Narcotic work was of primal importance; Mrs. Irene Taylor, of the Citizenship department for the state W. C. T. U., proved that the future of our prohibition law rested with an intelligent citizenship. Mrs. D. C. Ayres, of the department of Social Meetings, was confident that we could best work out our slogan, "A good time with a purpose," by doing work in her line. Each of our state Y. P. B. superintendents was equally certain that the department which he represented was the foundation for Y. P. B. success.

The presence of Mrs. Mary B. Wood, state W. C. T. U. recording secretary, and Miss Margaret Sloat, corresponding secretary, served to strengthen the bonds between the Y. P. B. and the mother organization.

A Message from South America

One of the most pleasant features was the visit of Miss Muriel Ayres, recently returned from South America. The messages which she brought from our comrades in the southland made us realize more fully our responsibility for world prohibition.

The spectacular features of the convention, planned by Mrs. Ayres, were of a high order. The opening evening she presented in pantomime, "A Day at the Convention," which was of unusual beauty.

Following the character talk on the last morning by Mrs. Maude Perkins, when she portrayed to us our responsibility for high standards in school, home and public life, the principal of Cook Academy (a school for boys), Prof. B. C. Cate, paid a high tribute to our principles and assured us that the school of which he is the head discourages the use of tobacco; that no member of the faculty can use tobacco and that scholarship aid is refused any student who uses tobacco.

A grand gold medal contest, poster contests, a banquet of unusual merit, rousing songs under the direction of Mrs. Marjorie Almy Carlton, hikes to Watkins Glen and other beauty spots, were but a few of the many things that filled the week with pleasure.

A new local union and a Young People's Branch were left in Montour Falls and foundations were laid for our work in near-by towns.

When the gavel fell for the final adjournment, the young people went to their homes recognizing that they are a part of a great organization whose leader is Christ and from Him comes all help; that more young people must be won to our cause; that we are the custodians of prohibition and must be ever alert for law observance and law enforcement, and that the principles of the W. C. T. U. and the Y. P. B. must be presented to all young people.

(Tune: "Hail to the Brightness of Zion's Glad Morning")

Hail to our country from bondage arisen,
Joy to the land that has seen God's great light.
Hark to the shouts of the once drink-cursed people
Saved from the blackness of sin and its blight.

Hark to the call o'er our country resounding,
Fight for the things that are purest and best.
Join now the ranks to enforce prohibition,
Help us to meet this great God-given test!

See, from all lands, from the isles of the ocean,
Nations are watching to see us succeed.
We as a nation must prove God's great promise,
"Whoso obeys me is blessed indeed."

W. C. T. U. Participates in Kansas City (Mo.) Boulevard Flower Parade

Fannie L. Taylor

The Kansas City (Mo.) Federated W. C. T. U., with other organizations, was invited by the city park board to have a part in the parade that was to traverse the seventy-five miles of boulevard system, as a part of a four days' celebration commemorating thirty years of park and boulevard development in Kansas City—a great civic festival.

As the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for more than forty years has worked for the city's moral uplift and was a large factor in helping to poll a majority dry vote in three state-wide campaigns, we were pleased to participate in this important event.

Overlaid with yellow petals, bordered with white carnations, and ornamented with a large white bow, front and rear, the W. C. T. U. car pictured was very beautiful. Our Flower Mission superintendent, Mrs. A. C. Liter (at the wheel), assisted the decorator with every detail.

The local unions bore the expense, which was not small. In the car were Miss Gertrude Boreman, the state Y. P. B. corresponding secretary, Miss Josephine Pratt, Miss Viola Brainard, Mrs. Leo Hicky and Mrs. A. R. Schubert, "Y" and "W" members. The car was applauded all along the route and was one of the few pictured in the Kansas City Star.

This parade came on the last day of the Kansas City Federation annual Flower Mission Week, which included, June 9, visits, services and the distribution o literature, flowers and fruits to hundred of the city's shut-ins; June 10, a beautifu memorial service at the grave of Clar C. Hoffman, with an abundance o flowers; June 15, a flower mission socia at W. C. T. U. Neighbors, with offering for the work; June 16, the boulevar floral parade as the grand finale.

"God Bless All the W. C. T. U.," Says Polish Lad

For more than thirty years the Iowa W. C. T. U. has visited each year all its state institutions. Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, state president, held her thirty-first service recently at the Men's Reformatory at Anamosa, where there are 987 boys committed for their first offense. The appreciation of these lads of the visits of white ribboners is frequently evidenced by letters, and the following was received from a young Polish boy, in acknowledgment of his gratitude for the Flower Mission service held at Anamosa:

"Just a little spray of a flower or two;
Just a nosegay from the W. C. T. U.
A small wee token that brought me joy and cheer
And tender mem'ries of my loved ones, so dear.
A little message to hope in Him above,
Gave me more courage and I pray'd for His love;
Comfort, forgiveness, guidance and strength I sought;
Such peace and sweetness, these little flowers brought,
For their kind goodness, I thank them, yes, I do,
And do pray God to bless all the W. C. T. U."

The second annual midsummer rally of the Salem county (N. J.) W. C. T. U. was held in the Friends Meeting House grounds, July 21, the date being referred to in the opening devotional service as L. T. L. Day and the birthday of our National W. C. T. U. president, Anna Adams Gordon. The morning was devoted to a ministers' Volsteadian round table, where facts were presented to show that neither the Eighteenth Amendment, the Volstead Law, nor the Ten Commandments would ever be repealed, but instead would be made more effective as home, community, nation and the whole wide world learned better to comprehend their blessed effect upon humanity. At noon-time, while the clans were enjoying the picnic part of the day with the box lunches, under the trees, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, president of the New York W. C. T. U., vice-president-at-large of the National W. C. T. U., and treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., arrived and was hailed with joy. From the inception of the work in Salem county, thirty-five years ago, Mrs. Boole has averaged one visit a year to the county, to help stimulate the work. This is the second time within three months she has spoken in the county. A fine audience gave undivided attention to Mrs. Boole's Bible reading and afternoon address on the vital need of an up-to-the-minute acquaintance with the situation and unceasing efforts to elect dry candidates to Congress. In the evening, an informal women's political social was held in one of Woodstown's ideal homes, when Mrs. Boole eloquently presented the necessity of women doing their part in the movement for national and international readjustment.

The Newcastle county (Delaware) W. C. T. U. is offering car fare for one person to and from Philadelphia, the World's and National W. C. T. U. convention city, to any local union or Young People's Branch in the county which gains ten new members, with a year's dues paid by October 12. This offer holds good for any multiple of ten, and enterprising unions or Y. P. B.'s are working to get sufficient new members to pay for the transportation of their officers to the big World's meeting.

Doesn't it make you cooler to see Mrs. Adelle Perkins, of Clintonville, Wisconsin, being drawn to a meeting of the W. C. T. U. on a sled? No, this is not a summer scene, but we venture to state that Mrs. Perkins, though in her seventy-ninth year when the above picture was "snapped" last winter, has been as faithful in her attendance through the warm weather, for, as her daughter says, "nothing can keep her from going to the W. C. T. U."

Michigan W. C. T. U. Plans Membership Drive for September and October

A minimum of ten new members fo every local union is the objective set by the Michigan W. C. T. U. for a member ship drive to be inaugurated Septembe first. While it is hoped and expecte that many unions will secure many time ten new members, it is urged that n W. C. T. U. be satisfied with less tha that number. During this drive no spe cial effort will be made to raise mone or secure honorary members, the cam paign being for the special purpose o SECURING WOMEN MEMBERS. Eac union is to decide for itself the best pla for securing members. Suggested meth ods are house-to-house canvass, publi meetings, letters, telephone invitations canvass of unpaid former members, mem bership contests.

We record here the names of friend and comrades who have recently passe to the higher life.

Illinois W. C. T. U. has recently beer bereft in the passing of three of its promi nent members: MRS. W. A. RAWLINGS of Murphysboro, state superintendent o Social Morality; MRS. JOSIE LUMMIS, o Quincy, former state superintendent of Child Welfare; and MRS. MAUDE SHEPPARD of Springfield, treasurer of the Sangamo county union. Each brought to her work loyal devotion and active service, which ceased only when the higher call came.

MRS. BELLE EASTON, of Covington Kentucky. For twenty-five years, Mrs. Easton had been a devoted member of the W. C. T. U., and as head of the local union for ten years, was a great power for good in the community. At the funeral service, in her home, her comrades of the W. C. T. U. each deposited a white carnation, as a token of love, and then together recited Mizpah. A special service was held some time later at the Union Methodist church, where the Covington union has met for nearly twenty years. Delegates from the many organizations of which Mrs. Easton was a member, in her memory placed among the fern leaves gracing the table—standing beside which she had for so many years presided—pink carnations. Following the closing prayer, which was offered by Mrs. Lillian Clarkson West, a number of new members were received into the ranks of the local union, in token that they desired to perpetuate the work so faithfully and ably carried on by Mrs. Easton.

Before and After Prohibition in the State of Massachusetts

the gains of the prohibition period are even more conspicuous. The thoughtful student of the tables will see throughout the record of 1919 and 1920, when prohibition first went into effect, the promise of what well observed and well enforced prohibition may mean to public health, welfare and security. The disparaging remarks made concerning supposed ineffectiveness of prohibition can nearly all be traced to comparison of conditions between 1920 and 1921, as, in general, the figures are less favorable in 1921, but that this phrase may not be wrenched from its context and used to give an erroneous impression, the writer includes with it the reminder that 1921 shows immense gains over the average wet year.

In view of the fact that Boston was a consistently wet city, that there has been no adequate state law to assist honest local officials who desired to make prohibition thoroughly effective in Boston and throughout the state, the results so far apparent are both significant and encouraging. The situation in 1921, in so far as it is an improvement over the old wet regime (as it is in all but a small minority of points) is cause for distinct encouragement. In so far as it is less favorable than in 1920, it is a challenge to defeat the menace of a traffic that organizes for lawless purposes at the expense of public welfare, and to support loyally a law that in a brief time has brought so much of benefit to the community at large as well as to individuals. What has been done, the state and city can continue to do.

Mrs. Truesdale's Arraignment

Agnes E. Volentine

Mrs. Truesdale laid aside her sewing, and unfolded the note brought by the children when they came home from school.

"Dear Mrs. Truesdale," it read, "I am calling a meeting of the former W. C. T. U. members at my house tomorrow afternoon at three, to discuss a matter of importance. Be sure to come.

"Mrs. L. K. Brown."

The recipient of the message resumed her work thoughtfully. "I wonder what—" she puzzled. Then, "Oh, perhaps they are going to reorganize. A state worker may have come. I do hope that is it."

"It will be hard for me to get off," she reflected, "with Helen's commencement sewing to finish, and the gardening, and other extra things. But I have always taken time for W. C. T. U. work."

She sent the machine whirring faster, and her thoughts ran rapidly. As the minutes flew by, she recalled her long, earnest years of work for the temperance cause; the joyful time when her hopes were at last realized, and the church bells pealed out victory. "But I kept right on," she remembered gladly. But most of the other members had not seemed to see the need of activity now that prohibition was secured, and it had become harder and harder to get together enough women to hold successful meetings. After the excitement of the battle, they had felt the reaction. And had they not, they seemed to reason, earned a rest from their labors?

Mrs. Truesdale had watched with sorrow this ebbing tide of interest, and the memory of how at last meetings ceased to be held at all was still a sore spot in her mind.

Without the W. C. T. U. to take the lead against the foe, law enforcement had grown weaker and weaker, and the bootleggers bolder. For a moment she pondered sadly over present conditions; then, her face brightened. "The meeting tomorrow will perhaps bring a change," she thought.

The next afternoon, busy Mrs. Truesdale arrived at the meeting just in time to be greeted by her old comrades before it was called to order.

Mrs. Brown, chairman and last president, first explained the purpose of the meeting: When the union had virtually disbanded, fifty dollars had been left in the treasury, and the Woman's Club had asked if this money could not be donated to the new library the Club was starting. Since the funds were lying idle and should be turned to some good use, it seemed that this would be the best thing to do. If there were no objections, would some one make a motion to that effect?

As Mrs. Truesdale listened to the unfolding of what was clearly a prearranged plan, her heart sickened. So this was it—not to try to revive the union, but to read its funeral notice and to settle the estate! Her dark eyes flashed a little.

The motion, however, was being duly made and seconded, and the vote followed. Unanimously the voices rang out "Aye"—except one!

Mrs. Truesdale's silence passed unnoticed. But when, a moment later, a perfunctory chance was given for any opposed to the motion to express themselves, she almost unconsciously started to say, "No." She tried to check herself—one dissenting vote would do no good, and the others would not understand—but her effort to repress the word was too late.

Mrs. Livingston Enthuses Convention of South Africa W. C. T. U.

Edith McKenzie

The fourth triennial convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of South Africa, held at Bloemfontein from June 3 to June 7, inclusive, was attended by forty-seven delegates from all parts, there being also present Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, World's W. C. T. U. superintendent of Franchise.

A very happy gathering of delegates and friends assembled, the first afternoon, in one of the parks near Bloemfontein, at the invitation of the mayor, where all who had not already had that pleasure, were enabled to meet Mrs. Livingston, to welcome her to our midst and wish her continued success in her South African campaign against the liquor traffic. Mrs. Livingston endeared herself to all by her earnest and gracious words.

The convention prayer meeting, conducted the same evening by Mrs. Gray, Johannesburg, Evangelistic superintendent for South Africa, assisted by Mrs. McEwan, Evangelistic superintendent for Cape Province, proved to be the helpful and restful occasion needed before commencing the work of the ensuing week, and helped us to realize the presence and power of a real and mighty God.

Two services on the following day—Sunday—and a Young People's service that afternoon in the town hall, all conducted by Mrs. Livingston, drew huge crowds and not one failed to receive a message of hope and encouragement, and a sense of power which Mrs. Livingston, out of the depths of her own experience of the Christ who strengtheneth those who trust Him, is able to convey so well.

The business sessions opened on Monday morning, June 5. Fraternal delegates present represented the National Council of Women, Women's Enfranchisement League, South African Temperance Alliance, International Order of Good Templars, Vrouwen Zending Bond, Oranje Vrouwen Vereeniging.

After the devotional exercises Miss Emilie Solomon delivered her presidential address. She spoke of the wonderful fact of America having gone dry. The whole world looked to that great country to prove that prohibition is as good for the nation as it has been proved good for the individual. In speaking of our own difficulties in South Africa, Miss Solomon urged that although the opposition was great we must not lose sight of the encouraging factors, the greatest of which was the co-operation of the churches. In recent years, the Dutch Reformed church had taken up the cause of temperance enthusiastically, even in the wine-growing districts. A petition in favor of local option had been presented to Parliament—the largest petition on record in this country, but the bill had unfortunately been shelved for this session. More and more the W. C. T. U. was convinced that so long as the women of this land were disfranchised very little could be done to effect legislation. Another matter in which the W. C. T. U. had made a determined stand, was the clause in the Native (Urban Areas) Bill, providing for the control of beer in locations. Municipal or national control of liquor was absolutely against our principles.

In conclusion, the president thought that we ought to concentrate on three questions—temperance, purity and suffrage.

There were six sessions during which all departments of work received due attention. The presence among us of Mrs. Livingston was a source of education, inspiration and encouragement to us all. She gave us a most helpful address on "Training for Citizenship," and also much valuable information and advice on legislation and petition.

At the close of the convention, Miss Solomon put forward, as an unopposed motion from the chair, that "We, members of the W. C. T. U. of South Africa express our deep appreciation of the work Mrs. Livingston has accomplished coupled with an earnest resolve on our part to endeavor to make it lasting."

Two public meetings, the first devoted to "The Truth About Dry America," and the second to suffrage, both addressed by Mrs. Knox Livingston, inspired the greatest enthusiasm. Seldom, if ever, have such crowds gathered in theatre or town hall, and from beginning to end each evening she carried her audience with her. To have a great cause at heart is a great thing, but to meet and hear a worthy leader of that cause is a still greater incentive to fight on till victory is assured. "Only South Africa can save South Africa," so it is up to us to see that the public sentiment in favor of temperance aroused by Mrs. Livingston is conserved into a mighty force to drive this evil of strong drink from our land.

Mrs. Truesdale's Arraignment

She felt the surprised glances turned upon her. Then came the announcement, "Carried!" Well, let the majority rule—

But what was Mrs. Garrett, whom she had always especially liked, starting to say? "Madam President, I should like to have Mrs. Truesdale tell us why she does not favor this motion. She was always such a faithful worker, and if she has a reason, I know it will be a good one. She has a right to state it, and we a right to hear it. No one here did more to earn that money for our treasury, or for the cause of prohibition in general, than Mrs. Truesdale."

There were several approving nods. And as the speaker sat down, the chairman prompted, "Mrs. Truesdale—"

That lady's temperature, however, was running first cold, then hot—cold, because she hardly dared express her real feelings, hot, because she could hardly suppress them. Then one or two pictures of present evil conditions flashed across her mind—and the hot side of her emotions won. She sprang to her feet.

"I did not intend to say anything," she began rapidly, forgetting to address the chair, "but since you insist, I am going to tell you the truth.

"My objection is not, as you may think, to the way the money is to be applied. If it is to be given to any local object, I am sure there could be nothing better than the library. And since the rest favor this, I would not oppose it.

"But what is hurting me is that the money should have to be given away at all. I did not, and could not, vote 'Yes,' for I felt that that would seem to give my consent to the deliberate disbanding of the union.

"Of course we had practically discontinued before, but not from deliberate intention; and I still had some hope that we might begin again some time. In fact, I came today hoping that this meeting was called for the purpose of reorganizing. So imagine my feelings when—"

She broke off with a little quiver in her voice; then went on more quietly: "I know you have not seen it as I have, or you would have gone on with the work. Though I have said little, it has hurt me to see the others lose interest, and stop doing what is still so sadly needed.

"Yes, it is needed. The fight is not over; it has merely been shifted to another battle-field, with continued education a necessity. To enforce the law now and to so train the children that they will enforce it in the next generation—that is still to be done. While the more we can educate the adults to want to keep the law, the easier it will be to enforce it.

"In our own town, while we have been resting on our oars, the bootleggers have flourished and the cause of prohibition has been set back a long way. More than this, these law-breakers, growing desperate because their time is short and their opportunities narrow, have even stooped to the putting out of deadly concoctions and to beguiling our young girls, as well as boys, into drinking—sending them often from amusement places, intoxicated.

"Do you know—surely you cannot—that last Saturday night a number of boys and girls from our best families were seen on the streets under the influence of liquor? And who knows but that it may be your boy and my girl next? What heartaches and sleepless nights—what a sad awakening will come then!"

Her earnestness gave to her words a simple power.

"No, our job is not done," she declared. Then, with a reminiscent smile, she continued: "When I was a young housekeeper, I once had great trouble keeping the spider webs from a certain room. They seemed to reappear almost as fast as I could sweep them down. Finally it occurred to me that I'd better kill the spider, and stop the cause of the webs. This I did—and then I got a rest!

"Now," she drew the conclusion, "that is just what we did in our young housekeeping days as temperance workers—we toiled to brush away the results of drink. But new effects kept coming as fast as we could sweep. So we decided that the best thing to do was to kill the liquor spider—to remove the cause.

"That was wise. But it was not wise to feel that the Eighteenth Amendment was the blow that completely killed the spider. He has been badly crippled, to be sure, as we all know, but he is not yet dead. And we must finish our job.

"A local editorial spoke lately of the bad moral conditions in our town, and asked, 'What has become of the W. C. T. U.?' What, indeed, I repeat, has become of the W. C. T. U.?" Her voice was tense as she concluded: "Has it fallen down on its job?"

As Mrs. Truesdale sat down, as suddenly as she had arisen, she breathed hard and her face flushed with excitement. But she was glad she had said what she did! At least they all knew now where she stood.

She waited for the explosion that she thought would follow. But—why, they were looking down as if they were ashamed! And Mrs. Garrett was saying sweetly, "Madam President, I, for one, wish to thank Mrs. Truesdale for her arraignment; it is the truth, and we deserve all she said, and more. We have, indeed, neglected our duty."

"And if the rest of you feel as I do," she continued more briskly, "we will rescind the action just taken and reorganize the union here and now—and we'll never stop till we finish that spider!"

The applause was vigorous. And almost before Mrs. Truesdale knew what was happening, they were actually arranging to go on with the work. And at the election of officers which followed, Mrs. Brown having refused to serve again, Mrs. Truesdale, her face glowing with the thought of the responsibility now more than ever hers, was unanimously elected president!

held up for referendum in November, and is combining its anti prohibition propaganda with a campaign to elect "beer and light wine" candidates. Newspaper publicity, billboards, and the foreign language press, articles deprecating prohibition, placed in reputable magazines, and appeals through public speakers, are among the means employed to attain its ends. (Sometimes, however, its well-laid plans gang some other way than straight, as happened recently when it was announced in a mass-meeting that the Hearst papers would come out for beer and wine, and within a week after the announcement the Boston American printed one of the strongest cartoons yet published, contrasting the conditions of the working man before and since prohibition!)

The "Sanity League of America," whose headquarters are in San Francisco, and which claims to have on its advisory board Congressmen Julius Kahn and John I. Nolan, flooded the Portland (Oregon) mails with a circular, in large type, urging readers, "If you are in favor of wine and beer and opposed to blue laws, join the Sanity League of America." Letters from the aforementioned Congressmen, the "platform" of the league, and a membership application blank were given therein. A reporter, hearing of thirty-nine soft drink places in cities around San Francisco Bay which were said to be selling liquor, interviewed the proprietors, and found thirty-seven who admitted that they had contributed heavily to a fund "to bring back wine and beer," though they did not know or would not state to whom the money went.

Perhaps these facts will shed some light upon the sources from which comes much that we see concerning the "overwhelming sentiment against prohibition."

Whole World Owes Gratitude to United States for Prohibition

"It is not drunkenness but that socially-tolerated and even encouraged habit of moderate drinking which hampers and injures our campaign against alcohol. Drunkenness destroys itself, it terrifies, while moderation is seductive and constantly creates new victims. The liquor capitalists know quite well why they are in favor of moderation."

Thus writes Dr. Franz Klein of Austria, formerly Minister of Justice, and a jurist of international reputation, as quoted by the Christian Science Monitor. Dr. Klein says that the whole world owes a debt of gratitude to the United States for what it has accomplished in the way of prohibition.

The anti-alcoholic campaign in Austria has now begun in earnest, with President Michael Hainisch at the head. It is planned to enlist in the fight everyone, without exception, who has the ear of the people, all classes and political parties, and above all, the press. The papers favorably inclined will co-operate voluntarily, but the adverse press is not to be neglected. False reports, such as that America is drinking more under prohibition than before it was introduced, will not be allowed to go uncontradicted.

Prepare!

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

We are satisfied every convention program will include the presentation of THE UNION SIGNAL and The Young Crusader, because every state, district and county president knows the great value of these papers to the membership. Now, when the time is given, what shall we do with it?

Every union should have a superintendent of the official papers working throughout the year; and, without doubt, every county and state has this office efficiently filled. Having secured a place on the program, we must PREPARE to fill it attractively, convincingly, and promptly.

Prepare the demonstration, or the points you wish to present: Who should take, When should they take, Why should they take the papers; The prices; What the Trio Team is. This last point can be emphasized by calling to the front the three officers of local unions who are subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Prepare to have subscriptions taken in the time allotted you.

Prepare to have a number of helpers so the subscriptions may be taken quickly. Have assistants instructed to ask for subscriptions as they pass through the audience, supplying order blanks, pencils, etc.

Prepare by having samples of our papers given to each person. Some fine article marked with blue pencil will insure more than a passing glance.

Prepare a display of THE UNION SIGNAL and The Young Crusader. A large piece of bristol board with papers tastefully attached with thumb tacks will serve the purpose.

Prepare by announcing that you or someone authorized will be stationed at a plainly designated place in the hall or church where more subscriptions may be handed in and questions answered.

THE UNION SIGNAL and The Young Crusader are prepared to give the W. C. T. U. women the best possible service.

Make the papers a "feature" in YOUR convention.

A Wonderful Offer

A COMPLETE RADIO OUTFIT will be awarded to the person sending in the largest number of yearly subscriptions—over 200—to THE YOUNG CRUSADER, between June 15, 1922, and September 15, 1922, at the regular price of 35 cents each. No other premium allowed.

Mark subscriptions plainly "Radio Award".

Remember what former president William H. Taft said? He said it would take ten years to give prohibition a fair test.

With the progress now being made in law enforcement, the dying out of old liquor appetites, the fear of many drinkers to use the poisonous stuff offered them, and the approaching maturity of boys and girls who don't know what liquor is, it seems prohibition will have proved its effectiveness by the time the ten years are up.—El Paso (Texas) Herald.

Vol. XLVIII | EVANSTON, ILLINOIS, AUGUST 24-31, 1922 | Nos. 34-35

The woman voter is the new political buttress in this country. The mothers of America, with the ballot in their hands, will stand almost one hundred per cent for the new order of things, and will ever grow increasingly insistent for the continuance of law, order, efficiency, and decency in the governmental affairs. The church, the home, the school, and womanhood form a glorious galaxy upon the horizon of our country's future which spells hope and security.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

CONGRESSMAN VOLSTEAD GIVEN CONFIDENCE VOTE IN HOUSE—STERLING AMENDMEN WITHDRAWN—TARIFF BILL EN ROUTE TO COMPLETION—INDICATIONS THAT ALL SOLDIERS WILL BE GIVEN COMPENSATION

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

On August 15, after six weeks of vacation, the House reconvened. Soon thereafter the President of the United States addressed a joint session of the Senate and House on the situation created by the coal and railroad strikes. The President told of the voluntary efforts of the administration to bring the "warring disputants" together, of the failure of his efforts, and then declared that "no matter what clouds may gather, no matter what storms may ensue, no matter what hardships may attend, or what sacrifice may be necessary, government by law must and will be sustained."

Mr. Harding recommended to the Congress the enactment of legislation which will give the President authority to create a national coal commission with power to make a searching investigation into the whole coal industry, with provision for its lawful activities and the bestowal of authority to reveal every phase of coal production, sale and distribution, because, the President declared, he has "an unalterable conviction that no lasting satisfaction or worthwhile results will ensue unless we may have a government commission independent of the industry, clothed with authority to search deeply, so that it may advise as to fair wages and as to conditions of labor and recommend the enactment of laws to protect the public in the future."

The simple but significant truth was revealed, the President said, that, except for such coal as comes from the districts worked by nonorganized miners, the country is "at the mercy of the United Mine Workers."

Mr. Harding recommended, also, immediate provision for a temporary national coal agency with necessary capital to purchase, sell and distribute coal carried in interstate shipment.

A bill providing for the creation of a coal commission has already passed the House by a vote of 219 to 55.

Seeks to Protect Aliens

Impelled by the sense of Federal impotence to deal with "the shocking crime at Herrin, Illinois," the President also asked Congress to consider favorably a pending bill to provide for the better protection of aliens, two Mexicans having been killed in the Herrin tragedy.

Congressman Volstead Given Fine Confidence Vote in House

The House this week swiftly struck from its record a resolution presented by Representative Tinkham of Massachusetts, foe of prohibition, calling upon Chairman Volstead of the Judiciary Committee to resign from his committee seat because of aid said to have been given by the temperance forces in his last campaign in the Seventh Minnesota District. Representative Mann of Illinois moved that the proposal be laid on the table, which would kill it, and the House laid it there. Then Representative Dyer of Missouri, a member of Mr. Volstead's Committee, offered a motion to expunge it from the Congressional Record and it went out by a vote of 141 to 3. A beautiful vote of confidence was this for Mr. Volstead!

Tariff Bill En Route to Completion

The Fordney-McCumber Protective Tariff Bill is a long step nearer completion than when our last SIGNAL Congressional news letter appeared three weeks ago. The bill was for months the center of a great political battle, but party lines were virtually held intact on the final roll call. Senator Borah of Idaho was the only Republican to vote against the bill, although Senators La Follette of Wisconsin and Norris of Nebraska were paired against it. Three Democrats, Senators Ransdell and Broussard of Louisiana and Kendrick of Wyoming, voted for the measure.

The Tariff Bill passed the House July 21, 1921, and was referred to the Senate Finance Committee the next day. This Committee reported to the Senate April 11, 1922. After four months of debate almost to the day the Senate passed it by a vote of 48 to 25. The Senate gave the President power to change rates and establish free trade zones where raw materials can be manufactured and exported without payment of duties. The House Bill is based on American valuation estimate and Senate Bill on foreign valuation. Republicans declare the measure will enable American workmen to maintain high standards of living and will protect industry from inroads of foreign competition. Democrats charge it will increase the nation's cost of living by millions of dollars because of duties on food stuffs and clothing. The proponents estimate that an additional revenue of $300,000,000 to $600,000,000 will result. The bill is now in Conference and the Committee has plunged into the work of harmonizing the 2346 differences between Senate and House.

Sterling Amendment Withdrawn

Senator Sterling withdrew his amendment to the Tariff Bill for extension of the three mile limit because the Secretary of State is having conversation with Great Britain concerning the same subject. To have pressed the amendment at this time might have complicated the arrangement which it is hoped may be consummated.

Indications That All Soldiers Will Be Given Compensation

The Soldiers' Compensation, or, as it is more frequenaly designated, the Bonus Bill, became the pending legislation before the Senate with the passage of the Tariff Bill August 19. Debate was deferred until Wednesday, the twenty-third, the Senate taking an adjournment until that time, to give members a brief rest after the long tariff fight.

On the twenty-third, the bill receiv an auspicious new start. In reco breaking time the Senate cleaned up t Committee amendments and the measu passed into the parliamentary stage whe individual amendments are in orde Less than fifteen minutes were requir for the adoption of forty-seven amen ments. Chairman McCumber, arde proponent of the measure, in his ope ing remarks declared that "this legisl tion is demanded by every precept financial justice and every principle political honor." Mr. McCumber stat that the government could "meet eve dollar this bill will call for without additional tax levy and without in t slightest degree affecting the refundi of any unpaid short-time obligation Senator Robinson of Arkansas made impassioned appeal in support of t measure. Unanimous consent agreeme has been reached to take up the measu Monday. The prospects are that a vo will be reached Tuesday. The bill wi provide substantially as follows:

1. Immediate cash payment at t rate of $1 a day for men who served mo than 60 days and less than 120 days, wit a limit of $50. This will mean an imm diate cash outlay of something lik $16,000,000.

(2). Vocational training.

(3). Farm and home aid.

(4). Adjusted compensation certi cates which in essence constitute insu ance running for 20 years, calculated $1 a day for home service or $1.25 a da for foreign service, up to a total princip of something like $650, with addition allowances for interest at an equivale of 4½ per cent interest.

Land reclamation was a fifth feature the House Bill, which the Senate wi probably not include but which may b added in conference.

Federal District Judges' Bill Out Conference

The Conference report on the bill cr ating an additional number of Feder District judges is out of Conference an before the two Houses for final action.

To Protect the Public

Senator Sterling of South Dakota ha introduced a bill in the Senate whic makes it a felony under the federal la for any person or persons to interfer with the operation of trains to the exte of causing fatalities. Under the terms this bill such persons would be charg able with murder in the event that live are lost as a result of such interferenc

Bill Reported to Limit Congressiona Expenses

The Committee on Elections, by a vot of 8 to 1, ordered a favorable report o the amended Pomerene Bill to regulat expenditures in connection with the ele tion of Senators and Representative under which no candidate for the senat could expend more than $10,000 "in an campaign for his selection as a candidat and for his election," while a candidat for the House would be restricted to no more than $5,000.

PRIMARY ELECTIONS IN OVER TWENTY STATES TELL THE STORY—ONLY ONE DRY CONGRESSMAN FAILS OF RE-ELECTION — ABOUT TWO-THIRDS OF NEW CONGRESSMEN NAMED FOR PROHIBITION — OHIO PRIMARIES A LANDSLIDE FOR THE DRYS

Checking up the more than twenty states that have nominated Congressmen to date, it is discovered that of the 256 Congressmen named, 220 were renominated, and of these 182 have voted for prohibition enforcement and 38 are wet. In short, only one dry Congressman has been defeated for renomination and of the new Congressmen two-thirds are for prohibition enforcement and against a beer and wine provision. The states that had voted at the time the analysis was made were Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia and West Virginia. The primaries held since then in Mississippi do not alter the situation, for while it will be necessary to hold another primary to determine which of the two Democratic candidates is nominated, both are dry and whichever goes to the Senate to take the place of Senator John Sharp Williams, will stand against any wine or beer proposition.

Ohio Primaries a Landslide for the Drys

The beer and wine question was one of the outstanding issues at the primaries in Ohio. The result was an overwhelming victory for the drys. Both candidates nominated for governor are dry. Hon. C. C. Crabbe, author of Ohio's dry enforcement measure, was nominated for attorney general, in spite of the bitter opposition of the anti-prohibition forces. Congressman Simeon Fess, among the staunch supporters of dry legislation in the House of Representatives, received the nomination of the Republicans for U. S. Senator. Twenty of the twenty-two Congressmen were renominated and nineteen of these are dry. Commenting on the election the Cleveland Plaindealer remarked, "Four years ago the voters of Ohio rejected two wet amendments to the constitution. Nothing that occurred in this week's primary indicates a change of heart on that issue."

Keith Theatres Ban Prohibition Jokes

A recent order given by E. F. Albee, president of the Keith Vaudeville Circuit, to every house under his control, strikes from the acts of performers all jokes about prohibition, whether in song or discourse. A representative of the Christian Science Monitor reports that a number of complaints about stage folk who persistently indulged in jokes regarding the Volstead Law and its enforcement, had been received by Mr. Albee from law-abiding people who looked upon these sallies as veritable assaults upon the Constitution of the United States.

This decision follows the example shown some time since in the passage of a similar ruling by the Orpheum, the western vaudeville circuit. In an interview a short time ago with a reporter, Marcus Heiman, chairman of the board of directors of the Orpheum, was questioned as to permitting actors to use the stage to ridicule prohibition. He stated that this is being rapidly eliminated. "It is realized that the individuals in our audience do not agree on this issue. Therefore, it is good policy to cut it out. No artist is permitted to offend. We always strive to make that clear," he said, and added that the first class acts in the better houses do not rely on the prohibition joke to get a laugh as do the cheaper acts showing in the lesser houses.

"The old saloon days joke is rapidly being weeded out of vaudeville," is the report, also, of John T. Nash, business manager of the Western Vaudeville Managers' Associaton, who directs the booking of acts to the principal theaters in the western states on the major circuits. "Better actors are cutting it out. There is a step toward more refined and better grade acts sponsored especially by the high-class artists. It is only the lesser players that continue to use it. Reference to 'the good old days' has been very much overworked, and the audience tires of this, irrespective of their views on the prohibition subject."

Ohio's Secretary of State Turns Down Beer and Wine Petition

Word has been received that the secretary of state of Ohio has declined to admit the proposed wine and beer amendment to the ballot. The petition, carrying approximately 30,000 more signatures than were required, was filed August 7 with the secretary of state. A protest against placing the proposal on the November ballot was made immediately by the temperance forces, on the ground that it is an attempt to nullify and is contrary to the Federal Constitution and in conflict with the Volstead Act, and that even if approved at a referendum election, it would be void, ineffective and inoperative and therefore an election would be unwarranted.

North Carolina Editors Stand For Law Enforcement

In its recent gathering, the North Carolina Press Association passed the following resolution: "Justice and equality before the law is a cardinal principle of a democracy, and it must follow that respect for and obedience to law is vital to the perpetuity of a republic. At this time, when lawlessness does much abound, when the law is evaded and defied, and respect for constituted authority is noticeably lessened, we, the editors of North Carolina, in convention assembled, do pledge ourselves, not only that we will at all times insist upon law enforcement, but that we will co-operate with and uphold the law officers in the performance of their duty; that we will insist that the guilty shall be punished, regardless of wealth, influence, or social position; and that we will use our best efforts at all times to build up a sentiment that will respect law as law and that will make any evasion or violation of the law odious."

State Granges For Prohibition and Law Enforcement

By a unanimous vote the masters of thirty-three state granges meeting at Syracuse, New York, recently, favored the strict enforcement of the Volstead Act, and urged that individual granges of all the states write to the Literary Digest for blank ballots in the straw vote that magazine is conducting, in order that the position of the farmers may be shown. Sherman J. Lowell, head national, according to press news, maintains that the national grange is emphatically in favor of the Volstead law and its strict enforcement, and that "virtually every farmer is a total abstainer."

Tactics of the Anti-Drys Are Anti-Patriotic

"There is an unmistakable attitude of over-confidence on the part of the friends of prohibition," declared Senator Willis of Ohio recently, and added that the subtle movement for beer and light wines is gaining recruits, and attempts are being made in every state to undermine the Volstead Act and make prohibition unpopular.

The general public is hearing a great deal about prohibition, but the wets are not advertising the fact that they are spending time, money and energy in a campaign to discredit it. Many people regard the issue as settled, and need some such thing as "straw votes" to make them realize that the forces opposed to prohibition are as active as ever.

Some of the factors which stand out most clearly in this wet and dry fight are thus summed up by the Christian Science Monitor:

"Liquor interests, including distillers and brewers, have improved and extended organizations and concentrated on beer and light wines as the entering wedge to wreck the Eighteenth Amendment.

"Anti-prohibition organizations, numbering approximately forty, are making an active political campaign.

"Restaurant owners in some of the largest cities, backed by hotel owners, are preparing for the battle.

"Drive of the wet forces is centered in sections considered favorable to their fight, including:

"California, owing to the large grape crop and former wine production; New York City, Chicago, St. Louis and the states of Wisconsin and Massachusetts, on account of their large foreign populations, where the hyphenated citizenry is counted on to oppose prohibition."

The state director of the Illinois Division of the National Association Opposed to Prohibition gives the following summary of the work done in Illinois, which may serve as an outline of its activities in most of the states of the union:

"State-wide effort to obtain signatures of 500,000 registered voters to a petition asking Illinois to vote on light wines and beer.

"Use of these signatures to influence candidates for office by the showing of wet sentiment in their districts.

"Interrogation of candidates on their stand on prohibition and broadcasting of information relative thereto.

"Support of wet candidates against drys for Congressional, state, and even local offices when the latter are important.

THE I. W. W. VS. THE W. I. I.—ELECTION TIME IS NEAR

Laura Parks Miller, Director Women in Industry Department

"Not I. W. W. but W. I. I.!" You remember the slogan of one of our Women in Industry unions? And you remember that cleaning up town politics was the first job of these W. I. I.'s?

Don't you need an energetic W. I. I. company in your regiment of Voting Christian Citizens this fall? There are employed women in your town who'd like a chance at learning how to vote right. But, you say, there are two walls between you and them; you don't know them—they don't know you. That is, they don't know, as you and I know, how much knowledge and experience can—and ought—to go into a vote to make it a right vote. They don't know that some W. C. T. U. woman in your town probably has more of that blessed knowledge—and hard-won experience and public spirit—and devoted Christianity—than almost anyone else to be found. Do you know her—this potential leader of a Christian Citizenship class? Can you find her? And plan with her and pray with her for success?

If you can find your W. C. T. U. leader the breach is made in the first and biggest wall. Next, the gate through which knowledge of your leader will reach the employed women.

Behold it! A two-color poster, on attractive tint paper. A catchy slogan—in red—"Vote Right!" A picture to appeal to factory and store and office women. A promise of a "citizens' club, for women who work, led by women who know."

If you've been interested enough to read so far, won't you start such a club in your town, now? The poster in factory or store window or church will gain you attention. Work out your own publicity details with the leader of the "club." Have dues or collections as you see fit. Keep an invitation to join the W. C. T. U. in the background until election approaches and the club realizes it doesn't want to disband. See page 16 of THE UNION SIGNAL for price of posters. It isn't high—get some!

Jane Addams Says—

"Ideas must be dramatized before they reach the mass.....

"The personal example promptly rouses to emulation.....

"The quality which a heterogeneous population, living in one of the less sophisticated wards, most admires is the quality of simple goodness....."

A practical citizenship teacher got her group—a rural one—together in this way:

She found out that good roads was the crying need of the community. Then she brought this need home so that—

Mary W. knew that a road from her father's farm to town would make her much desired normal training possible.

Mrs. B. knew her baby might have lived if the doctor had had a good road to travel on.

Mrs. E. knew her daughter need not have married a Polish farm hand but for the poor road that isolated her from her friends.

Mrs. C. knew that running her widow's farm alone necessitated a good road to town.

Remember, if you want to reach the employed woman—

That time is precious to her. You must be ready.

That she probably is interested mainly in personal things. A dry candidate to Congress means nothing until after you have won her loyalty.

That she will respond to the appeal of service to others if you strike the right note.

That she will not let you patronize her.

World's and National W. C. T. U. Convention Notes

The National W. C. T. U. Convention will be held in the Chambers Wylie Memorial Presbyterian Church, located at Broad Street below Spruce Street, Philadelphia.

Three delegates are coming to the World's Convention from Australia: Mrs. John McCleod, president of the Australasian W. C. T. U.; Mrs. W. H. Carvosso, its national corresponding secretary and World's superintendent of the department of Exhibits, and Miss Adie Robertson, who has assisted in the juvenile work in Victoria.

Mrs. J. S. Nagle, of Singapore, who is on a furlough, has been appointed as the official representative of the Malaya W. C. T. U. at the World's convention.

Mrs. Lydia B. Johnson, who as special representative of the W. C. T. U. of the United States is helping the women of Sweden in the prohibition referendum campaign, and is to be at the World's Convention, writes in the following graphic words of a meeting held July 27, at Kiruna, within the Arctic circle:

"On the occasion of my meeting a boy scout beat a drum at the entrance of the park at eventide on the hillside. Seven hundred people gathered. Below us was the blue lake and away to the north the ever snow-white mountain peaks. Blue and golden flags waved in the gentle breeze. Earnest, eager faces everywhere. Oh, the joy of it! There was laughter for the humorous touches, serious attention to the recital of facts, and tears for the tragedies of the liquor traffic. There was a promise of hope for better things in the clergyman's prayer. The boy scouts played the well-beloved patriotic music of Sweden.

"I wonder if the women realize the seriousness of the work that remains when the referendum is over, Aug. 27. The victory—for we confidently expect to win—must be carried on to the election of the Riksdagsmen, which comes in September. If that is not done, then all this work will be of little or no value. There is a double danger that only the experienced workers or the students of law and history recognize. The referendum provides that ballots of men and women shall be marked and counted separately. This is a covert danger to the franchise of women, as it is secretly understood that the votes of the women may not be given the same value as those of the men."

W. C. T. U. Worker in Germany Factor in Victorious Straw Vote

The Associated Press recently broadcasted the news that the first vote on prohibition taken in Germany had resulted in an overwhelming majority for prohibition. The message was from Bielefeld, Germany, the home of Fraulein Wilhelmina Lohmann, a leader of the German Union of Total Abstinence Women, which has been affiliated with the World's W. C. T. U. for more than a score of years. With her associates Fraulein Lohmann has been working quietly for several years to make sentiment among her people against the use of alcoholic beverages. Her correspondence with Miss Anna A. Gordon began in 1920, and literature, funds and every possible help has been given to aid her. It is gratifying to learn that at the ballot taken in the first police precinct of Bielefeld of 14,069 qualified voters, 12,626 voted for prohibition and only 416 against it. The newly organized campaign committee for the German prohibition movement is planning to take similar votes in other parts of the country. Fraulein Lohmann is on her way to this country to attend the World's W. C. T. U. convention at Philadelphia, as one of its official delegates.

The people of Germany are being aroused by the agitation of temperance advocates as to the money wasted on alcohol—an average of 3,500,000,000 gold marks annually. The saving of this sum would be sufficient, say the prohibition workers, to "shake off the yoke of the reparations burden and all its bitter accompanying effects. Germany's credit abroad would rise instantaneously if, like America, she showed her moral strength to decide for absolute abstemiousness."

CITIZENS OF WESTERN STATES OPPOSED TO MODIFICATION OF THE PROHIBITION LAW

Welfare of Youth of Land Jeopardized by Non-Enforcement of Law

Ethel Stoner, Mayor of Cokeville, Wyo.

I have too much faith in the women of America to believe that they will ever demand the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, or take one backward step in the movement for real prohibition. Most of the women of my acquaintance are strongly in favor of prohibition. I have always found them upon the right side of this and all moral questions, and my experience teaches me that we need have no fear as to where American women as a whole will stand upon any question touching the life of the home.

I have seen much of the evil effects of the liquor traffic and, though present conditions are far from satisfactory, I believe them to be a great improvement upon the days before prohibition. The abhorrent saloon with all its repulsiveness has been removed from our gaze and from that of the youth of this generation. Here in the west we women are no longer jostled on the street by reeling drunkards, and many of the worst features of the great evil have been eradicated. True, we have the moonshiner and the bootlegger with us, but my undying faith in the ultimate triumph of right over wrong assures me that soon these, too, will go the way of the saloon and the saloon-keeper.

Men in office, owing to their business interests and a certain false sense of good fellowship, often do not act as courageously in the enforcement of the prohibition law as they otherwise might, and it begins to look as if this disagreeable duty is going to devolve upon the women, and who knoweth whether we are come to the kingdom for such a time as this? There is no question but that prohibition rightly enforced is a great boon to mankind and it remains for the women of this land to see that it is rightly enforced, unpleasant though the task may be, for what care we for ridicule and criticism, for misrepresentation and persecution when the welfare of the youth of our land is at stake and our country itself in jeopardy? But better than the compulsory enforcement of the law, which now seems necessary, is the moral and religious teaching by precept and example, with accent upon the example, which will in time lead to a voluntary compliance with the law, for love is the fulfilling of the law, and this task, also, is in a great measure ours.

People of Oregon in Favor of Volstead Law

B. F. Mulkey, Lawyer, Portland, Ore.

Prohibition in Oregon is far from being a failure. The court dockets, municipal and state, show a tremendous falling off in cases involving drunkenness, or growing out of it.

In innumerable instances, men who were formerly expending their earnings largely for intoxicants and in mingling with others who used the same, are now taking better care of their families in the way of providing food, clothing and education, and are accumulating bank accounts.

Prohibition has been a success to the same extent that the laws against arson, theft, burglary and murder have been—there are some violations of all of these laws. As long as there is need for a law there will be violations of it. There have been violations of the prohibition law. A large percentage of these have been followed by successful prosecution. The courts are inflicting stronger penalties from time to time and the violation of this law is becoming more hazardous and less frequent from day to day. The people of Oregon, in my judgment, are in favor of the prohibition law and the continuance of the Volstead Act in its present form. Public sentiment in favor of enforcement of the prohibition law is growing and the enforcement of that law is keeping pace with this growth.

Among the rising generation there is rarely ever a violation of the Volstead Act. This condition being true, under the Volstead Act we see the use of intoxicating liquors in our state and country in course of ultimate extinction.

> "I think there is less to be feared from those who are positively hostile to law enforcement than from those who are negative or fail to express themselves," says Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes. "Never was there greater necessity for the law-abiding forces of America to be a unit than at the approaching elections in their support of those candidates who have come out wholly and patriotically on the side of law and order."

Where Women Count

[As the Portland (Ore.) Telegram Sees It]

A campaign is on foot, promoted by the liquor traffic, for a subscription list of a million men at one dollar a head, for the purpose of smashing the Eighteenth Amendment. The subscription list is to be called the "Association Against the Prohibition Amendment." Their declared purpose is "to get the Volstead Act out of law and to keep it out"; to leave the enforcement of the amendment to the several states, and to work persistently for the repeal of the amendment. They expect to use their funds chiefly in newspaper advertising to show the people "the hideous failure and the enormous cost in money and lives of prohibition as now enforced."

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, through whose work, more than that of any other force, public opinion was molded for the prohibition amendment, has met this challenge of the liquor forces by a call for a half million new members to the Union, in addition to the half million now in its membership. These members are not only pledged to keep the Volstead Act in the law, but are pledged to total abstinence and to work for the destruction of everything for which the old saloon ever stood.

It must be remembered that this organization of women is something more than a woman's prayer meeting. It is a voters' organization that counts as much at the ballot box as a half million men. And it must also be remembered that in counting values in American citizenship, other things being equal, one aggressively good woman has greater power in shaping public opinion than two aggressively bad men. The A. A. P. A., which is but the defeated saloon, will in this campaign have to meet the victorious W. C. T. U., which completely routed the un-American saloon in a running fight of fifty years' duration.

Conditions in San Diego Much Better Under Prohibition

John L. Bacon, Mayor San Diego, Calif.

I am sorry that I cannot answer the questions regarding prohibition put to me and others by THE UNION SIGNAL, with exact data, but can give only general impressions as to the effect that prohibition has had on our city.

Perhaps the most marked effect is on the city jail. Where formerly on Saturday night there would be anywhere from ten to fifty prisoners booked, most of them drunk, or arrested because of drunkenness, now, at that time, we will have only three or four and these are generally there as the result of a visit to Tia Juana, Mexico, which is only a few miles from San Diego. This is rather remarkable when you consider that San Diego has a sailor population, due to the naval activities, of from 5,000 to 10,000 men (dependent upon what boats happen to be in port).

I do not think that there can be any doubt but that conditions are very much better now than they were several years ago and are getting better and better all the time. It is almost a foregone conclusion that things must be more prosperous when it is considered that a man earns a definite amount of money and spends it at the grocery store, meat market, and so forth, instead of in the saloon as before. Probably the only ones who have suffered here have been the owners of property where saloons or questionable resorts were maintained, as it is known that property brings a higher rental when used for these purposes than when used for ordinary lines of merchandising.

If my personal feelings and observations would carry any weight, being based simply upon general observations of conditions, I would state most emphatically that I would not, under any circumtances, ever consider going back to the old regime.

Improved Family Life Best Argument for Prohibition

Ralph H. Burnside, Officer Willapa Lumber Company, Portland, Ore.

In response to inquiry as to my opinion regarding our present prohibition laws, I wish to state that I am unequivocally opposed to any letting down of the bars. I am aware of the large volume of bootlegging that is going on and violations of the law in that respect. This is, in my judgment, only one of the phases that might reasonably have been expected in an effort to change practices of many years' standing. I believe that these phases will in time disappear, having run their course.

Prohibition is bound to prosper because it is economically sound, to say nothing of being morally right. The real test as to its success up to date is with the families of the men who formerly spent so large a proportion of their income for liquor. These families now enjoy comfortable homes, good living conditions, automobiles, and many of the luxuries of life.

In my judgment, any proposition submitted for weakening the prohibition law in any way would meet with overwhelming defeat.

ANNUAL CONGRESS OF REFORMS STRESSES PATRIOTISM OF THE HIGHEST TYPE

Jennie M. Kemp

A program unexcelled by that of any Chautauqua, a week at the seashore, with the wonderful scenery and floral beauty of the Monterey peninsula, and seven days of white ribbon comradeship—what more profitable pleasure could one ask of life?

The annual Congress of Reforms, under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of California, was held July 30-August 4, at Pacific Grove, the long-time home of the Congress.

The welcome was well expressed by Rev. C. E. Winning, pastor of the M. E. church, when he said in the church bulletin: "We rejoice to have the elect representatives of the best the state stands for as our guests. We give the keys of the church to Mrs. Addie Garwood Estes, and the pastor and every member of the church will gladly serve the cause of reform in any manner which our guests will be kind enough to suggest." At the close of the week Rev. Winning, who had scarcely missed a session, summed it up as "the best program and finest meeting ever held in Pacific Grove."

Peace, industrial problems, prison reform, Americanization and law enforcement were featured on the Congress program, but overshadowing these subjects, and stressed by almost every speaker, was the Wright law campaign in which we are engaged.

The Congress opened Sunday morning with a great peace sermon, "Christendom for a Warless World," by Rev. Winning. The large audience, by unanimous rising vote, adopted and ordered sent to President Harding a resolution advocating no more war.

In the evening the house was packed to hear Dr. Mary Harris Armor speak on "A Square Deal." Mrs. Armor was at her best and the response showed the enthusiasm of the audience for a square deal for the Eighteenth Amendment by the carrying of the Wright enforcement measure.

Another very large and delighted audience greeted Mrs. Kathleen Norris as she presented her plea for upholding the Constitution and serving America at the ballot box in November. Captain Frank Ebberts, a veteran of two wars and legal representative of the Anti-Saloon League, preceded Mrs. Norris with a masterly address on "Upholding the Constitution." Mrs. Norris is a winning and convincing speaker, greatly in demand in the campaign. She talks of prohibition enforcement "As a Mother Sees It," with all the earnestness of our Crusade mothers. At a recent meeting, in one of our Bay cities, where she was announced to speak, 2,000 people were seated, all standing room was taken, and 500 turned away.

The Congress closed with a reception addressed by Governor William D. Stephens. Mrs. Ina A. Orvis, state treasurer, who was untiring in her work for the success of the Congress, was hostess for the occasion. Governor Stephens was introduced by Mayor James Harper, of Pacific Grove. The thronged church and enthusiasm of the audience betokened the popularity of this "bone-dry" governor, and his appeal to work for the enforcement of law and the carrying of the Wright law.

Dr. Frederick Vining Fisher, of the National Committee of One Hundred on Industrial Peace of the Federal Council of Churches, spoke Monday evening on "When Friday Comes to Town." In a most interesting way he demonstrated that the industrial problem could not be solved by x over y, or y over x, but must be x+y if civilization is to survive.

Captain Charles Goff and Captain of Detectives Duncan Matheson, both of San Francisco, discussed the criminal problems of the day. Captain Matheson urge the re-establishment of the old-fashione home life with its thrift teachings an home entertainment. He emphasized th need for the religious training of th young in the Sunday schools.

Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, a sistant United States Attorney-General, i charge of the prohibition enforcemei department of that office, made a earnest plea for law enforcement. Sh spoke of her humiliation that her ow state, California, had no state enforc ment law and urged the great importanc of voting for the Wright measure.

Mrs. Oliver C. Laizure, wife of th chaplain at San Quentin, thrilled he audience as she told of the prison refor problems in connection with the wome who are there. Miss Blanche Mors superintendent of the State Industri Farm for Women, put it upon the co sciences of her hearers that the deli quent woman was everybody's problem.

Three largely attended morning co ferences were conducted by Mrs. Jenni M. Kemp, state campaign secretar "The Underwriters' Association" brougl out the responsibility of the organiz tions and individuals who had underwri ten the Eighteenth Constitutional Amen ment. Dr. Mary Harris Armor spok for the W. C. T. U. and Dr. C. W. Gav throp, the untiring and unstampedabl superintendent of the Northern Califo nia Anti-Saloon League, for that orga ization. "The Radio Wave," the topic the second conference, brought out th importance of more publicity by pen an tongue for the success of prohibitio Newspaper clippings on the Wright la campaign and the work of the W. C. U., for four months, 945 in all, wer shown. Only 58 contained argument against the Wright law. Miss Mar

W. C. T. U. WORK BEGUN AT CHAUTAUQUA HAS SPREAD THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

Maude B. Perkins

"The most attractive place on the grounds" is the way the young woman who conducted the tours of the Chautauqua Institution characterized the headquarters of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Groups of people under her direction, twice each day heard the story of the beauty of the exhibit and availed themselves of the opportunity to look into our room at Kellogg Hall. This telling exhibit was placed by Mrs. Carolyn P. Lindsay, national superintendent of Fairs and Exhibits, who also served as hostess during the biennial convention of the Federation of Women's Clubs. Hundreds of people have learned how the Woman's Christian Temperance Union cooperates with many clubs and organizations comprising the General Federation.

W. C. T. U. Headquarters in Kellogg Hall, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Stepping into our headquarters, one's eyes rest first on the beautiful Frances Willard memorial window, placed there by Mr. and Mrs. John Martin. As Miss Willard was doubtless the first woman to enunciate a program of social morality from a public platform, it was especially fitting that the posters depicting the work of the Social Morality department should be on display. The bright, clear face of "The Girl of Today, the Mother of Tomorrow" challenged all who saw it to a determination to have the young people know the joys of clean living.

Arranged in the shape of a heart were scores of the Law Observance posters, enclosing the pictures and posters of the Americanization centers, emphasizing the fact that the work to be done among our friends from other countries is of vital importance.

An appeal for the protection of children through the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment was the theme of a handsome, hand-made poster in blue and gold. The "five pointed program" of the Child Welfare Department was best demonstrated in a handsome baby-blue poster over six feet long, showing a score of babies carrying banners and clamoring for their rights.

The Industrial Creed of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union formed the center of the Women in Industry section. The banner showing that one woman in every four in the United States is at work was supplemented by another calling one woman in every twenty-five to membership in the W. C. T. U.

The flags of the nations surrounded pictures of the officers and leaders of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Draped from the ceiling were sections of the Polyglot Petition and in a border around the room were Jubilee posters speaking eloquently of the movement which made possible the extended work of the departments and setting of the goal of World Prohibition, and from the window gleamed the Law Observance star. On a manifold were displayed the picture of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, and such leaflets pertaining to the work of the Scientific Temperance Instruction department as stressed the fact that teaching the truth as to the effect of alcohol upon the human system is what has given to America the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

On invitation of Dr. Bestor, president of the Chautauqua Institution, July 15 was observed as National W. C. T. U. Day, the address being given by Dr. Valeria H. Parker on "The Government Program of Protective Social Measures." Following this address in the amphitheater, she conducted a conference in the Hall of Philosophy, discussing a community protective program. These two addresses by our national director of Social Morality, were regarded as two of the most vital messages given expression at Chautauqua.

Five regular W. C. T. U. conferences were held in the Hall of Philosophy, the general theme, "The W. C. T. U. as a University of Reforms," each department a college within it. Christian Citizenship and Law Enforcement were discussed by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, headquarters hostess, and Miss Helen G. H. Estelle; Social Welfare by Mrs. Sylvia Bemis, Pennsylvania's superintendent; Americanization by Miss Edith Bowes of Colorado; Exhibits and Fairs (stressing the carnival question) by Miss Mary Sayers of Pennsylvania; Scientific Temperance Instruction by Mrs. Charles Spencer of Kansas, who told of the work she did in England following the World's W. C. T. U. convention. Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., showed how all these lines of endeavor, linked up with the evangelistic work, had contributed to make the W. C. T. U. an educational reform organization.

Dr. Jesse L. Hurlburt, who has been connected with Chautauqua since 1875, was the first speaker on a program devoted to World Prohibition, and told of the early work in Chautauqua. Addresses by Roger Wang, a student in Syracuse University, brother of Frances Willard Wang, and Mrs. Margaret B. Denning, for ten years president of the W. C. T. U. in India, showed how the work, begun at Chautauqua, had reached all parts of the world.

Lloyd Homer of the Pennsylvania Y. P. B.; Charles Howard, Prof. Harry Guthmann, and Miss Belle Whitney, of the New York Y. P. B.; Miss Caroline Ward, Miss Mildred Radeker of Pennsylvania, and many other young people from various states have attended the W. C. T. U. meetings. These have been characterized as different from others on the ground in that so many young people, members of the Y. P. B. all over the country, have been in attendance.

Among the hundreds who registered, many are prominent in state, national and world work.

Surely no part of the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund is more far-reaching in results than that spent for the work at Chautauqua, New York.

New Jersey Club Women Call for War Upon Lawlessness

In a message to the forty thousand club women in New Jersey, published in the year book just issued for distribution at the fall convention, the president of the state federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. Arthur B. Prowal, states that defiance of the Constitution has become so general, especially as exhibited in the attitude toward the Eighteenth Amendment, that loyalty demands active war against lawlessness.

"The call is coming from all parts of the state for our federation to take some action or express itself in regard to the unprecedented lawlessness which has broken out in defiance of our Constitution," says Mrs. Prowal. "The reaction is felt in every section of the state. Beautiful towns formerly proud of their records are in the grip of bootleggers and officials who either can not or will not see that the offenders are brought to justice.

"Are the club women of the state going to sit idly by, indifferent to the call for help? Never has there been a more definite need for patriotism than right now. During the war we were asked to be eyes and ears for the government, to help locate the propagandists and the traitors. Today we should take the initiative and flood our officials with the reports that are coming to us with actual names and addresses of people dealing in illicit liquor traffic. We can't see the honor of our state torn to shreds without a desperate attempt to defend it.....

"The greatest service any club can give any community, is to produce intelligent, patriotic, well-balanced, one hundred per cent American citizens, and no woman can be that until she has taken her citizenship as a sacred obligation."

National W. C. T. U. Officer Bereaved

The white ribboners of the nation extend loving sympathy to Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, assistant recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U., and president of the Virginia W. C. T. U., in the passing of her only sister, Mrs. Anna Elliott. After a long illness, Mrs. Elliott entered into rest, Sunday, August 6, at her home in Wrightstown, Pennsylvania, surrounded by those nearest and best loved. She was a loyal member of the W. C. T. U., always sunny hearted and keenly interested in all forms of social welfare service.

Mrs. Livingston Returns to United States

Word has been received at National Headquarters of the safe return to the United States of Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston. Reports of the remarkable success that attended her tour of South Africa have appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL, and we hope soon to have from her pen an article on the situation in that country. The recent appointment of Mr. Livingston to the general secretaryship of the New England Evangelistic Association has necessitated a change of residence for the family, and after September 1, Mrs. Livingston's address will be 306 Lake Street, Newton Highlands, Massachusetts.

States in Referendum Campaigns

Referendum campaigns are in progress, or contemplated, in Ohio, California, Massachusetts and Illinois. These referendums have been inaugurated by the associations working to restore light wines and beer. The California campaign is in the interests of a vote on the state enforcement measure passed by the legislature but held up by referendum through the agency of the wine and beer interests. The Massachusetts situation is similar. The enforcement code was passed by the legislature, signed by the governor and brought before the people for a referendum through the anti-prohibition interests. A wine and beer petition for an amendment to the Ohio constitution has been filed with the secretary of state, carrying about 30,000 more signatures than are required. A similar petition signed by 500,000 voters of Illinois is about to be filed. The results of these referendums will not of course be decisive, and in effect they are simply straw votes, and should not be permitted, since they are an attempt to nullify the Federal constitution, and are an unpardonable waste of the people's money.

NOTE: Since the above was written, word has been received that the Ohio petition will not be admitted to the ballot.

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES AND OTHER INFLUENTIAL ORGANIZATIONS

W. C. T. U. speakers are urgently requested to secure from all meetings which they address the adoption of this resolution:

RESOLVED: That we declare against any modification of the Volstead Code which would admit wine or beer or otherwise weaken enforcement, and will do all in our power to insure the election November 7, 1922, of members of the United States Congress and state legislatures who will work and vote for the retention and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

(Through your local papers give wide-spread publicity to the resolutions thus secured.)

The Poll That Counts

Commenting on the result of the Ohio primaries, Arthur Brisbane, editor of the Chicago Herald-Examiner, remarked sententiously, "Anybody who imagines that the prohibition amendment could be repealed in this generation will learn his mistake by watching elections."

Don't let any straw vote persuade you into the belief that the voters of this country have changed their minds about the value of national prohibition. Check up on the primary elections held in over twenty states, and note that they show an overwhelming majority against the beer and wine candidates, notwithstanding the fact that the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment exerted every possible effort to nominate its men. Bring this indisputable fact to the attention of the skeptics that are inclined to credit the assertions of our opponents that the people of this country have no faith in prohibition.

Democratic and Republican Women Organizers Say Women Voters Are for Prohibition

Are the women of the nation in favor of modification of the prohibition laws so as to permit a return of beer and light wines?

The organizers of the women in the Democratic and Republican parties scoff at this idea, which the emissaries of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment are circulating. Mrs. Emily Newell Blair, Democratic national committeeman in charge of organizing the Democratic women voters, and Mrs. Harriet Taylor Upton, chairman of the Republican National Women's Committee express themselves as believing that the women voters will stand by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law.

Mrs. Blair is quoted by the Christian Science Monitor as saying, "The women voters organized under the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and such organizations can best serve prohibition first by their votes, and next by working through their own parties to nominate dry candidates at the primaries. Let the women get themselves elected as delegates to county, state and national conventions, where they would have a more active voice in the management of party affairs. In that way they can do their most effective work. Women have always been the mainstay of prohibition and there is no doubt that their sentiment will continue to be overwhelmingly for its strict enforcement."

Mrs. Upton is reported by the same paper to have said, "The women of this country will stand united as a solid bulwark against attacks on prohibtion. They are going to defend the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act with every available resource and power at their command, and with such opposition the wets will inevitably see their efforts come to nothing. Women are not being fooled by the arguments of the high-salaried leaders of the anti-prohibition organization.....The women's vote is becoming stronger every year. It is already strong enough to be a powerful obstacle to the ambitions of the wet forces. Women will never be willing to see their sons and husbands again subjected to the vicious influences of the liquor interests. Women have the welfare of the family too much at heart not to realize the speciousness of the arguments advanced by the wets. Women are being told that it is better to legalize liquor than to have bootlegging. Does anybody really think that by allowing light wines and beer to be sold we are going to do away with bootlegging? Our past history in this line has proved that as a nation we cannot be 'moderate' in the matter of liquor. Yet this is one of the arguments advanced in the campaign for wet votes. There are two issues upon which the women of the United States are going to take a united stand. For these they will work tirelessly, until they are accomplished facts; two issues beyond consideration of party. THESE ARE EFFECTIVE PROHIBITION AND INTERNATIONAL PEACE."

The results of the primaries so far, indicate that the women are using their ballots very effectively to support the dry and defeat the wet candidates. If your primaries have not yet been held, canvass your community and see that every woman is informed and convicted on this vital subject. Then work day and night for the election of the advocates of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law on November 7.

The Home Guard

To build a piece of machinery which will turn out useful products, time and skill are needed. But an anarchist needs little of either to throw something into the intricate parts of the machine which will stop its production for a time or forever.

To put the Eighteenth Amendment into the Constitution of the United States of America has been the work of generations. As the wheels of the prohibition unit turn more and more smoothly the value of its products is more evident. But throughout the land are opposing organizations doing their utmost to discredit the value of the products and to clog or to destroy the machinery.

Until these attempts cease, an armed guard must be maintained day and night. Is there a unit in your town? Are the members of the various community organizations in the ranks of the home guards? Have you put up placards in public places inviting people to enlist in your local unit? Are you handing out cards to suggest to the passersby that Uncle Sam needs them to guard the machinery of the Constitution? Have you four-minute speakers at public gatherings?

When we went into action against a physical enemy these methods were used to get the men to join the army and navy and to act as home guards for protection of munition factories and other important places against the onslaught of anarchists, spies, and traitors. It may be less popular, but can it be less necessary, to enlist volunteers for our struggle? On election day (and on primary day, if your primaries have not yet been held), let every one in your local unit be at the ballot box, ready to turn his or her weapon, the vote, against the enemy.

Gives Up a Thousand a Month For Principle

Because principle means more than dollars to him, William Allen White, editor and author, has resigned the editorship of Judge. That magazine recently opened a campaign to restore wine and beer, and as Mr. White is "a convinced and confirmed prohibitionist," to quote his statement to the Kansas City Star, "there was nothing to do but quit. I felt I should not remain as editor of a paper advocating things that I did not believe in."

Mr. White received a salary of one thousand dollars a month.

Miss Norville to Represent W. C. T. U. at Brazil's Centenary Celebration

Twenty-five nations are to participate in the centennial celebration and exposition of the republic of Brazil, to be held at Rio de Janeiro, from September 7, 1922, to March 31, 1923. Miss Hardynia Norville is to represent the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union on this great occasion. The United States Congress has appropriated a million dollars for official exhibits to represent the progress of this country in science, industry and commerce, and the cornerstone for the U. S. Government building has already been laid. There is to be a Goddess of Friendship statue presented to Brazil, to overlook the harbor of Rio de Janeiro. The temperance forces of Brazil are planning for special meetings to promote the anti-alcohol movement, in which Miss Norville will participate.

Dr. John G. Woolley, Noted Temperance Leader, Dies In Spain

The temperance cause has lost a gifted champion in the death of Dr. John G. Woolley, which occurred on Sunday, August 13, at Granada, Spain, after a very brief illness. Mr. Woolley was candidate for president of the United States on the Prohibition ticket in 1900. He was well known as an able lawyer, an eloquent platform speaker and a forceful writer for the press. At the time of his illness he was making an investigational tour of European countries as a special representative of the World League Against Alcoholism. Accounts of his experiences have appeared in a series of brilliant letters published in the American Issue.

Christian Church Condemns Lawlessness

The Christian churches of southern California, recently gathered in convention in Long Beach, passed strong resolutions, among them the following:

"We note with grave concern the flippant and lawless attitude of many people toward the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and regret that among the law defying element are to be found people who are ordinarily law abiding and self respecting. We, therefore, urge upon all who seriously regard the moral welfare of our state and country the most positive convictions and the most uncompromising expression of the dignity and inviolability of the Constitution of the United States and the rigid and conscientious enforcement of its provisions."

Good Templars Demand Fair Test For Prohibition

The International Order of Good Templars, at its convention recently held in Butte, Montana, pledged itself to work for the election of men who will enforce the prohibition laws, protested against efforts now being made to undermine the Eighteenth Amendment, called upon the heads of the motion picture industry to abolish from the screen anything that would promote lawlessness, passed a resolution asking that prohibition laws be made effective on all ships under American registry and flying the American flag, and commended those newspapers which have stood for the observance of prohibition and its fair treatment.

For God and Home and Every Land

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Few

The easy roads are crowded;
And the level roads are jammed;
The pleasant little rivers
With the drifting folks are crammed.
But off yonder where it's rocky,
Where you get a better view,
You will find the ranks are thinning
And the travelers are few.

Where the going's smooth and pleasant
You will always find the throng,
For the many, more's the pity,
Seem to like to drift along.
But the steeps that call for courage
And the task that's hard to do
In the end results in glory
For the never-wavering few.

RED LETTER DAYS

September 28—Children's Harvest Home (Birthday of Frances E. Willard).
October 29—World's Temperance Sunday.

SUNDAY SCHOOL DEPARTMENT

Dear Sunday School Workers:

World's Temperance Sunday draws near. The date is October 29. We trust that it will be made a great day for Christian citizenship and law enforcement in the Sunday schools of the United States. Evidently the International Lesson Committee desired that attention be given to the needs of the campaign for world-wide prohibition. A most excellent quarterly lesson has been selected for the day, found in Isaiah 61:1-9. The Golden Text (Prov. 14:34) presents a warning truth to all nations.

Study the lesson with the view to making temperance application, considering first the bearing of Christianity on social reform and then the "good tidings" of prohibition and what it is doing for humanity.

It is binding up the "broken-hearted", opening the "prison doors", giving "a garland for ashes", and the "oil of joy" to many who mourned. It is building "the old wastes" and repairing the "desolations of many generations", while it gives "justice" instead of "robbery".

The Lesson Leaflet of the Department gives temperance topics for all divisions of the Sunday school, suggestive applications and a chart for class blackboard work. The price is only 20 cents per 100 and it should have a wide circulation among Sunday school teachers and officers.

The program for the Sunday school hour, prepared by the national superintendent, bears on Christian citizenship and law enforcement. It gives an outline for a talk which could well include the benefits of prohibition in the United States and a brief review of the progress of prohibition in other countries.

The new Blackboard Exercise will be helpful in presenting the need for law enforcement and the present status of the movement against our law enforcement code. Price of program and blackboard exercise, 2 cents each; 45 cents per 100.

World's Temperance Sunday is the great annual Sunday School Temperance Rally Day of the year. Public meetings for children, temperance pageants, Sunday school medal contests, law enforcement platform meetings are suggestions of the department.

World's Temperance Sunday has become the annual Citizenship Recognition Day for young voters of the church and Sunday school. Many schools are adopting the plan of citizenship training recommended by this department. Our method leaflet (price, 2 cents) gives suggestions for a course of study and the department provides a Questionnaire, a Citizenship Vow, and a complete Program for Recognition exercise. Samples, 2 cents each.

World's Temperance Sunday for pledge-signing. While we urge pledge-signing on each temperance Sunday, the culmination of our year's pledge work is on this day. Be ready with the present day arguments for pledge-signing and aim to pledge every member of the Sunday schools. Pledge flags are made of red, white and blue cards and the Christian flag is made of our Sunday school covenant, used in many schools as a decision card.

World's Temperance Sunday will test the efficiency of the Sunday School department of every union. Given this annual Temperance Day in all Sunday schools, the opportunity for widespread endeavors is ours. May we seize this opportunity to promote Christian citizenship, law enforcement, and to reach the goal of our slogan, "Every Sunday school teacher and officer an active or honorary member of the W. C. T. U."

Unions desiring special help in the interest of efficient Sunday school work are urged to enroll their superintendents in the mailing list of the national superintendent and receive the departmental bulletin which gives this quarter a citizen's memory verse, a paragraph for the church bulletin, a publicity paragraph for the press, and a citizenship exercise for intermediate pupils. Also free samples of current helps for Sunday school workers. The cost of enrollment is but fifty cents, which helps pay postage. Send enrollment fee to the national superintendent.

World's Temperance Sunday for Seed Sowing. Distribute temperance literature in every department of the Sunday school. Our department supplies and many other suitable leaflets are published and sent out by the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House. Note carefully the catalogue and the special leaflets advertised in THE UNION SIGNAL. Order generously and in time to receive the literature for World's Temperance Sunday.

Yours in the Master's Service,
(Mrs.) Stella B. Irvine,
National Superintendent Sunday School Department.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

GLIMPSES OF Y. P. B. ACTIVITIES IN FOUR COMMONWEALTHS

Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. General Secretary

Intelligence, consecration, enthusiasm and efficiency characterized the work of the young people in our state Young People's Branch conventions. I am convinced that a state federation of Young People's Branches, meeting at a time when young people are free and in a place where a convention program and a vacation spirit may be combined, is the best way to advance the work.

It does pay to establish young people in temperance principles and high ideals. An address by Dean Shailer Matthews of the University of Chicago on "Vocations and Avocations," given at Chautauqua, made me feel more keenly that the young people of our organization are carrying on our work. At these conventions I realized that many of our young people have finished high school and college and are established in their vocations, but will find their avocations in carrying out the program of the W. C. T. U.

Mr. Raymond Howard, the president of the Ohio Young People's Branch, is publishing a magazine all his own, and is the city editor of a daily paper in Wilmington, Ohio. Busy as he is all the time, he is ever ready to give his best to our work. The high point of the Ohio convention came when a letter was received from Pauldine Forry, a former state officer, now teaching in Santiago, Chile, in which he told of the medal contest work he is doing and of the scientific temperance work in the schools, carrying out our plan of essays. He appealed to the young people of the state to finance these two lines of work in Chile. Had the Ohio Y. P. B., during its ten years, developed only these two young people it would have been worth while, but there are thousands whose lives have been established in right fundamentals and who are contributing to the efforts of our organization.

In Pennsylvania, all new officers were elected with the exception of the treasurer. It is most gratifying that all of the retiring officers are doing active W. C. T. U. work. One of the speakers at the convention was Rev. Roy Manning, a busy pastor of a Brooklyn (N. Y.) church, a former state president of the Pennsylvania Y. P. B., who is finding both his vocation and his avocation an opportunity to promote the Christian ideals of the Young People's Branch.

The first convention encampment of Delaware surpassed all expectations, both in attendance and achievement. For the past two years, due to the interest of Mrs. Mary Donnell of Newcastle county, large delegations had been attending the New York convention, and this first state federation convention was made possible by the efforts of Mrs. Donnell, the inspiration and enthusiasm gained by Mrs. Bertha McCaulley Foster at the New York state conventions, and the untiring work of Mrs. Lillie Atkins, the state Y. P. B. secretary. The zeal of the young people was evidenced by fifteen new life memberships in the state Y. P. B., these helping to furnish funds to carry on the work. Delaware's plans for its next convention are already formed.

The hearts of the young people of New York state were gladdened by the presence of Miss Muriel Ayres, who brought greetings from the young people of South America. The new president of the New York Y. P. B. is Sidney Ayres, brother of Muriel, who graduated this June from Cornell, received a scholarship, and will enter Union Theological Seminary in New York City this fall. Busy as he will be, he will find time for the work of the Young People's Branch. Professor Harry Guthmann, retiring vice-president, who came into the Y. P. B., as did Sidney, during his high school years, carrying both state and local responsibility through college, has been a state officer and superintendent during his five years as professor in Syracuse University, and now as he takes up his duties as associate professor in the School of Business Administration in the University of Texas, he will carry with him the training of the Young People's Branch, and will, if opportunity presents itself, help to establish the work in that great state. Francis Harper, who succeeds Mr. Guthmann as vice-president, is a trusted employe of the Pennsylvania railroad, but finds time to push the work of the study course and to carry on the work of vice-president in a great organization. Percy I. Dunn, the retiring president of the New York Y. P. B., has been made superintendent of Citizenship.

Those making up the personnel of the Young People's Branch for the past ten years have now reached the age when they are out in the world, in public and private life, living the ideals of our organization. Remember that the work is going on, and today, in high school and in college, there are in training other members of the Young People's Branch who will continue to "carry on." The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has always been considered a missionary organization, and this is equally true of its child, the Young People's Branch.

The presence at these four conventions of Miss Anna Adams Gordon, National and World's W. C. T. U. president, was a great inspiration. The work of the Social Welfare department was presented by Miss Rebecca Rhoads, national superintendent.

No state can do better work than to begin to lay foundations now to federate. If you have not a sufficient number of Branches, begin by organizing local Branches with a state federation in view.

The outstanding feature of the Young People's Branch is its practical Christian approach to the problems whose solution is of vital importance to the young people of today.

In visiting the schools, one finds hundreds of girls who have been and are members of the Y. P. B., many of whom are now acting in the capacities of local and county secretaries, state officers and state superintendents; they are found in homes—young mothers—thus passing on the training to the next generation, and all are confident that there is no organization that would have so well fitted them for their work as did the Young People's Branch of the W. C. T. U.

Pennsylvania Y. P. B. Presents Fine Program at Annual Convention

Special Correspondence

The thirty-first annual convention of the Pennsylvania Y. P. B., held at Du Bois, Clearfield county, recently, was a red-letter event, marked as it was by the presence of World's, National, state and county W. C. T. U. officers, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U. and now serving as president of the World's W. C. T. U., heading the list. In the absence of the Y. P. B. president, Frank S. Rush, the second vice-president, presided most acceptably.

Delegates and visitors to the number of about two-hundred-and-fifty assembled at the Du Bois Country Club for the opening reception. After an eloquent prayer by Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., hearty greetings were extended by Mrs. Lillian Trezise, president of the Clearfield W. C. T. U., Miss Edna Rhodes, Y. P. B. county president, Rev. M. E. Davis and Mayor A. J. Haag of Du Bois, to which Miss Harriette Curtis of Wayne county responded.

The state W. C. T. U. and Y. P. B. officers were introduced by Miss La Rue M. Chorpenning, general secretary of the Pennsylvania Y. P. B., and a continuous receiving line formed; thus began many new friendships, more firmly cemented by the days of work and pleasure that followed. Excellent reports, most of them showing substantial increases over the preceding year, were given by the various superintendents.

John C. Arnold, district attorney of Clearfield county, delivered a most interesting address in which he called attention to the exaggerated statements made regarding law violations and said that when an intoxicated man is now seen, the fact is impressed upon the observer by his sense of indignation, whereas formerly, when there was no law against drinking, he felt simply disgust. "Where you see one man intoxicated now, you saw twenty-five intoxicated before prohibition, and as time goes on conditions will be still further bettered," Mr. Arnold declared.

Loving tributes were paid to the memory of Mrs. Elma Preston, "mother" of

W. C. T. U. Notes

Paragraphs on W. C. T. U. Happenings

Dr. Mary Harris Armor was in California (North) during July. In spite of the heat in the valley cities and the fact that July is a vacation month, Mrs. Armor addressed large audiences. She won many influential voters to a support of our law enforcement campaign. At the close of her last address at Pacific Grove hands were clasped, "God Be With You" sung and traveling mercies asked for this beloved campaigner. Mrs. Anna Marden De Yo, state corresponding secretary, gave the last farewell August 4, as Mrs. Armor went out through our Golden Gate on her long voyage to New Zealand.

Rev. Gifford Gordon of Australia, who came to the United States eleven months ago to study at first hand the results of the prohibitory law, believing that his country could never hope to pass a similar one unless the appalling reports of the failure of the Eighteenth Amendment could be disproved, has gathered from unprejudiced observers a wonderful array of favorable testimonies upon which to base his conclusions, which he gives with telling effect. He recently addressed the Woman's City Club of Los Angeles in debate with an opposition speaker, the topic being the Wright Act. This club is quite English in its freedom to heckle the speakers by questions, and when the members got through there was little left of the "anti" speaker.

The Campaign Conference Committee, organized to carry the Wright Act, gave a delightful luncheon for Mr. Gordon and his wife. Mrs. Eva C. Wheeler, president of the Southern California W. C. T. U., and chairman of the committee, presented Mrs. Gordon with a large silk American flag, reminding her that it is the sacred symbol of our love for country and humanity.

Over 1,400 Milwaukee boys and girls were reached this summer in the combined educational campaign of the Young People's Christian Citizenship League and the Willard, Lathrap and Lillian Stevens W. C. T. U.'s of that city.

Mrs. Mary Money Eggert, representing these four organizations, arranged with the principals of sixteen daily vacation Bible schools to bring an interesting scientific temperance lesson to their pupils.

Eighteen talks were given. In every case a Bible temperance story was told. This was followed by a telling experiment showing the effect of alcohol. A chart illustrating the "Rule of Three" made a deep, and it is hoped, lasting, impression. The chart shows that one bottle of wine, two bottles of beer, or three ounces of whisky contain the same amount of alcohol, hence are equal members of the poisonous alcohol family. Every talk ended with an appeal to the patriotism of the boys and girls, and especial emphasis was laid on the importance of respect for and obedience to law.

Children of the various races were reached, twenty-one nationalities being represented in one south side school.

Strong leaflets on beer and wine were given to the children, and in this way were gotten into homes which could have been reached in no other way.

Under the leadership of Mrs. Mary E. Garbutt, state superintendent of Peace and Arbitration for the Southern California W. C. T. U., a No-More-War demonstration was recently arranged. Three able speakers, Judge Ryckman, Reverend Bromley Oxnam, pastor of the church of All Nations, and Mrs. Mollie Bloom Flagg, club woman, presented the topic from different standpoints to an appreciative audience. A strong resolution was unanimously adopted and ordered sent to President Harding.

The Shelley Club, a group of women who give intensive study to civic problems, joined with the W. C. T. U. to make the meeting possible and profitable.

The forty-first annual convention of the Butler county (Pa.) W. C. T. U., held recently in Butler, Mrs. T. E. Harbison, county president, presiding, opened with a goodly number of delegates present. Greetings were voiced by Mrs. Lyda S. Findley, president of Butler Central, the hostess union. Mrs. Annie Gardner gave the response. The principal speaker of the afternoon was Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., who chose for her subject, "How to Do All Things." Mrs. Harry Wimer conducted the annual memorial service.

The evening's program, which was closed by Mrs. George, included devotional exercises conducted by J. W. Carr, a reading by Mrs. Wimer, and an address by Aaron S. Watkins, noted lecturer and reformer.

The playlet, "The Sick Baby," presented by the Loyal Temperance Legion, was an interesting feature of the second afternoon's program. The convention closed with a praise service conducted by Miss Inis F. McClymonds, reports of committees, and a report on children's work by Mrs. J. E. Foster and Mrs. W. Howard Humphrey. Before leaving, Mrs. George complimented the union on its efficient organization and the work it is accomplishing.

the Pennsylvania Y. P. B., whose beautiful character exerted a strong influence on the lives of the young people of the state.

Miss Amanda Landis, vice-president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., conducted a most interesting and instructive parliamentary drill, in which many of the delegates participated, and also favored the convention with several of her inimitable readings. Miss Ella Broomell, state corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Leah Cobb Marion, state treasurer, led a round-table discussion on methods of work, giving the delegates the benefit of the knowledge of two experienced experts along official and departmental lines, and bringing forth from the floor many helpful suggestions. One of the speakers, Rev. John B. Kniseley, pastor of the convention church, having conducted the study class of the Du Bois Branch, graduating fourteen members, was able to advance many good ideas.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life.

A CRUSADER PASSES TO THE HEAVENLY HOME

MRS. HENRY C. WILKINS, of Jennings, Louisiana, who has just gone to her reward, was one of the original Crusaders, and helped to organize and promote the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She spent her life in the cause of temperance and for years was an active leader of the temperance forces in town, district and state, being the president of Louisiana's W. C. T. U. during the years 1907-9. To her untiring efforts was largely due the construction of the W. C. T. U. auditorium in her home town, and her request that her funeral services might be held there was characteristic of her love for the work. A most consecrated and consistent Christian, prominent in church and Sunday school work, her life was a real benediction to all who knew her, and she is mourned by the entire community.

The many friends of MRS. ANNA A. BEAL, former state organizer for California (North) W. C. T. U., will be grieved to learn of her passing from this life. Following the National W. C. T. U. Convention in San Francisco last August, she came to Evanston, Illinois, to take charge of the stock room of the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, and rendered most efficient and devoted service in that capacity until early spring, when she was called to Wellington, Kansas, by the serious illness of her aged parents. Her death occurred at Wellington, at the end of a short illness. For years Mrs. Beal has been among the ablest and most self-sacrificing workers of northern California, where she was greatly beloved.

Minnesota on the Move in W. C. T. U. Work

Bessie Lathe Scovell

Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, state president, has been almost constantly afield during the year. May, June and July were district convention months, and Mrs. Sizer was the helper and speaker at most of the thirty conventions. She reports excellent results. She entertained the state central committee meeting, held August 8, at her home in St. Paul Park. She has been most energetic in putting across the trio team plan for THE UNION SIGNAL and in gaining new members.

Mrs. Ella Tenny Sanford, Wisconsin's field worker, did house-to-house W. C. T. U. work in Minnesota for a month, and organized a W. C. T. U. of forty-eight members at Stillwater, another at Lake City with twenty-eight members and a third at Winona with thirty members. She also secured twenty members for the Anoka union.

The Seventeenth W. C. T. U. district (Hennepin county) gave a benefit concert for the Mother-Child center to be established in Minnesota as soon as sufficient funds are raised. Two hundred dollars was sent to the state treasury. The concert was held in the Shubert theater. The district held its annual convention early in the summer and its annual picnic on the lawn of Mrs. Kate Kercher at Brookside.

The Twenty-third district (Ramsey and Washington counties) held an annual convention and annual picnic. It dedicated a white marble fountain in memory of Miss Eva Jones, former president of the district, who gave her life to help make St. Paul a cleaner city. At the dedicatory service Mrs. Laura V. Ward, president of the district, presided, introducing the district treasurer, Mrs. H. S. Madland, who had charge of raising the funds. Mrs. Madland stated that the money had been given by the women of the W. C. T. U. Rev. V. M. Pollock, of the Hamline W. C. T. U., led the singing and Rev. J. A. Earl, pastor of the First Baptist church, St. Paul, led in prayer. Mrs. Bessie L. Scovell told of the work of Miss Jones for temperance in Minnesota, and of her heroic character. Mrs. Florence Pottle, district vice president, in beautiful language gave the presentation address. Mayor Arthur E. Nelson, with his council, received the gift for the city of St. Paul. Mayor Nelson is the son of a W. C. T. U. mother and is a fine, young attorney, who has just been elected mayor.

Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, World's and National superintendent of Sunday School work, formerly of Minnesota, visited her old home friends for a short time in St. Paul after attending the International Sunday School convention at Kansas City. She was guest of honor at a tea, at the home of Mrs. Della R. Mandigo. Among those gathered to greet her was Mrs. Cornelia B. Forbes, former president of the Connecticut W. C. T. U., now a resident of Minneapolis.

Minnesota's annual convention will be held in Central M. E. church, St. Paul, August 29-September 1. Mrs. Frances P. Parks, national corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Nelle Burger, president of the Missouri W. C. T. U., will be the guests of honor.

The Minnesota Woman's Christian Temperance Union holds an annual Flower Mission service in three of the state institutions. This year that of the Old Soldiers' Home took place at Minnehaha Park Sunday, June 16. Beautiful flowers, furnished by the local unions of the "twin cities" with Scripture texts tied with white ribbon, were given to each old soldier. Miss Annie E. Wright, state superintendent of Flower Mission work, has charge of the distribution at these institutions. Mrs. Martha J. Reed, state treasurer, led the singing and rendered two solos, accompanied by her son, Clinton. Mrs. Jessie Cox also sang, Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, state president, preached the sermon at the morning service and after dinner again addressed the soldiers' widows. The hospital was visited at three o'clock, and flowers left for the sick ones.

July 16, forty women of the local unions of the "twin cities" took the 8 a. m. Stillwater car for the state prison at South Stillwater to hold the annual Flower Mission service. 921 bouquets of garden flowers were presented to the men at the chapel service, held at ten o'clock. Mrs. Vernon Baldwin sang devotional solos and Mrs. Bessie L. Scovell, state vice-president, preached the sermon. Mrs. Kate Kercher, state corresponding secretary, presided; Mrs. Myra Griswold, state recording secretary, read the scripture.

The prison band played beautiful selections. The Prison Mirror, the paper edited and published by the prisoners, printed the programs, making pretty covers. As is the usual custom, the ladies were entertained at dinner at the prison.

August 6, the annual Flower Mission service was held at the woman's prison at Shakopee. Garden flowers for forty inmates were provided by the local unions of St. Paul and Minneapolis. Mrs. Martha J. Reed sang and Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer preached the sermon.

Annual Congress of Reforms Stresses Patriotism

Helen McLean, W. C. T. U. publicity director, was the speaker. Twelve women, with five minute campaign speeches suitable to give before moving picture audiences, contested for an autographed copy of "Mother," by Kathleen Norris. Mrs. Alice K. Murphy was awarded the prize.

The theme of the last campaign conference was "Carrying the Torch." Mrs. Sara J. Dorr and Mrs. Frances C. Gilmore, state lecturers and organizers, gave instruction in "Starting the Machinery" of the campaign and "selling" the Wright law to the "uninterested." Four "leading ladies" illustrated the best way to win voters in doing house to house precinct work.

The social features of the Congress were most enjoyable. The white ribboners of Pacific Grove were untiring in their efforts to give every possible assistance. The floral decorations were unusually fine, as Pacific Grove is noted for its wonderful dahlias and gladioli. The Chamber of Commerce took all who wished to go, on the famed "Seventeen Mile Drive," through historic Monterey, beautiful Del Monte, to the artist colony at Carmel with its blue bay of indescribable beauty, stopping for a time at the Y. W. C. A. headquarters in Asilomar.

The Woman's Civic Club, Miss Laura Egan, president, tendered a reception in honor of Mrs. Kathleen Norris and Dr. Mary Harris Armor. The club house was tastefully decorated and the afternoon was one of unalloyed enjoyment to the crowd who came to greet these distinguished and lovable women.

On the cover of the Congress of Reforms program was a reproduction of our blue poster with its white star, which calls upon us all to "Serve America" and "Uphold the Constitution." And all through every session the patriotic thought was prominent. In the salute to the flag, the music, the readings, the addresses, it was constantly stressed. Ours is a patriotic campaign. We strive that California may "support the Constitution" by passing a state prohibition enforcement law.

The spiritual note was constantly sounded. One afternoon was given to an evangelistic meeting conducted by Mrs. M. M. Elmore, superintendent of the department. Rev. H. D. Pettit led the community singing. Lack of space prevents mention of many other splendid features of the program. The state executive committee held three important meetings. The work of the W. C. T. U. of California is moving forward vigorously and harmoniously.

To Mrs. Addie Garwood Estes, state president, belongs a large share of the praise for this great Congress. Mrs. Estes worked untiringly in the preparation of the program and in securing the distinguished speakers. As a presiding officer, she was universally praised. Her poise and dignity, ability to meet any emergency, courtesy and consideration for all who had a part on the program and her leadership of the white ribbon forces in this most crucial campaign, were matters of mutual congratulation among the women from the seventeen counties officially represented at the Congress.

WHY NOT A PIC-NIC?

Why not have a World's Convention picnic some warm day in September? Put a "sticker" on the edge of each of the wooden plates, on the outside of each cup, upon each basket or pail which contains the picnic supplies, and every other possible place. They can also be used for place-cards by pasting on the backs plain paper, and together with the name may be put a question about the time, place, personnel, etc., of the convention. Try it!

For picnics, for letters and cards, for books, trunks, suitcases, parcels, and in every way you can advertise the convention, the sticker is just the thing. And remember that summer prices still prevail—only $2.00 per thousand, $1.25 per five hundred, and for fifty cents you will receive one hundred and twenty-five stickers. Send to

Tactics of Anti-Drys Are Anti-Patriotic

"Organization of business men throughout the state into local units of the Illinois division.

"Filing of light wine and beer petitions, September 11, and a drive from then on to roll up as big a vote as possible for the project by means of speakers throughout the various districts and mass meetings in leading cities."

The drys cannot afford to grow careless, no matter how secure they may feel. In one dry district of Illinois the wet candidate would have had no chance had a campaign in his behalf aroused the drys. But the wets made no move until a few days before the election, when they sent word through the district to the people whose names had been signed to the wine and beer petitions, and the man was nominated.

In New Jersey, as well as in Kentucky, the wets are apparently lying idle, doing no work for the elections. Some of the drys are apprehending some underhanded move at the present time, or some similar sudden move to be made when it is too late for any organized defense.

A series of articles is being published by the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal, showing that "the bonus and the tariff and the ship subsidy are important, but none of them affects the fundamentals of national life as vitally as does prohibition enforcement." The paper claims that bootlegging has become an industry, "striking at the roots of law, order, authority, and government," and the fight of the Federal Prohibition Commissioner and his officials is being made in the face of almost insuperable odds, not because all America is drink-loving, or lawless, but because the bootlegging combine (which "has no official corporate existence, regular name or recognizable general headquarters, yet functions, silent and sinister, with the precision and comprehensiveness of a great industrial organization") exists to promote, scientifically and systematically, the illicit liquor industry of the country at large, and uses enforcement officials, judges, juries, court authorities and candidates wherever possible. Its members have political "pull," and use all political parties. Among their objects are: The placing at strategic posts in the prohibition enforcement service and elsewhere of officials useful to them, and the maintenance of friendly relations with all branches of Federal, state and municipal government concerned with administration of liquor laws, especially the prosecuting authorities and the courts.

That the efforts of the wets are for the gratification of personal desires without danger, or for money interest, is clearly indicated by the project undertaken by the Society of Restaurateurs of New York City, which, according to The Restaurateur, its official weekly publication, is outlining a nation-wide anti-dry campaign this fall. According to this periodical, "There are considerable grounds for hope in ultimate victory. The dry forces are being beaten at every turn." The three hundred members of the society in New York City have been assessed $50 each, with the assurance that they will be richer, not poorer, by their contributions. This organization, according to data given by the New Jersey Temperance Society, together with the Hotel Association of New York City and that of New York state, made up the American Hotel Association, which went out of existence in 1920, after the flagrant violation of the Corrupt Practices Act of which the New Jersey branch was convicted; from its ashes sprang the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, with the same methods and many of the same officers, in close affiliation in New Jersey with the president of the United Brewers' Association.

Further proof that the wets are anything but patriotic may be found in the hyphenated societies which are springing up, or reviving, having for their purpose ostensibly only the return of wine and beer, but with much the same personnel as was found during the war to be unpatriotic in other ways. The German-American Alliance, formerly used to perpetuate German ideals even at the expense of the United States, and to oppose prohibition is being revived under the name of the German-American Citizens' League of America. One of its declarations, adopted at the convention held a short time ago in Chicago, reads: "We demand the immediate legalization of the sale of wine and beer to end the reign of hypocrisy and corruption which is disrupting the very foundation of law and order in the United States." This conference also authorized sending a questionnaire to candidates for Congress, asking their attitude on beer and wine.

The league is organized in ten states, claims a voting membership of a hundred thousand in Chicago alone, nearly twice that in Wisconsin, seventy thousand in Pennsylvania, and is strong in Massachusetts, Maryland, Indiana, Iowa and Minnesota, while a new branch has been formed in Missouri and another is organized in New York. It is affiliated with one hundred thirty-six German-American organizations in Chicago, and more than thirty in the county. In truth, the wets have concentrated upon the centers where there is a preponderance of foreign population, selecting leaders to whip into line these foreigners, who are thus tools of the breweries and distilleries, Wisconsin and Massachusetts, being largely "hyphenated" states, and cities having a preponderance of foreign population, as New York City, Chicago, and St. Louis. The people are told that "it is the moral, religious, and civic duty of every good citizen to refuse obedience to the Volstead Act."

One more item of interest is that the Anti-Saloon League states it has in its possession printed evidence that much of the money being used for the wet campaign in America is coming from brewing interests in England, and that the bootleggers are contributing to the fund.

All of these wet societies are wealthy and their machinery runs as smoothly as clockwork. Concentrating on a most definite objective they refuse to permit any internal difference to swerve them from that objective. They have learned from the prohibitionists that it is by persistent and united efforts that battles are won, and declare confidently that unless the latter look to their laurels during the coming months the present large dry majority in Congress will be at least greatly lessened, with the prospect of total disintegration within the next two years. If such a thing happens, the unthinking portion of the population of this and other countries will no doubt conclude that prohibition does not pay and that it is for that reason diminishing in favor. Far from it!

Invest Today!

A. M. S.

Your attention, please! Yes, we are going to tune our harp to the same old theme, "Subscriptions," but today we expect to play the Library variation. Is THE UNION SIGNAL to be found in your public library? If not, why not? What's that? Your union "didn't happen to think of it"? Here is our official paper, one of the finest mediums for disseminating prohibition truths, and there is the public library, affording one of the best possible methods for reaching the people. And you didn't think of connecting up the two! But those canny antis are expending a pretty sum for getting half-truths and specious arguments into the daily papers. They know the value of publicity. They know what seed sowing means.

The public library is patronized by all classes. To its rooms flock the student, the teacher, the scholar who seeks broader information than is found in the musty old books at his command, the preacher, and just the ordinary, undistinguished individual who is looking for a little relaxation. Perhaps, when glancing over the magazine rack, one of these, inspired by curiosity, may pick up the covers that contain THE UNION SIGNAL, open them, and find an unexplored world. It may be the scholar, who has been a bit antagonistic toward prohibition because, forsooth, he prides himself on being very "liberal" in his views. "Why," he will exclaim, as he dips into the pages, "I didn't realize that there is another side to the question." Something has been accomplished. We have caught his attention.

The preacher will welcome the opportunity to gather material for that fine temperance sermon that he has in mind, the student for the prize essay that he means to write, the teacher for her class work; but if we could reach only a few, and those the Doubting Thomases, the expenditure of money and effort would be justified. Frequently those who have really been favorably disposed toward our cause have been won over by the enemy because THEY DO NOT HEAR "THE OTHER SIDE" OF THE QUESTION! They must be made to see from our viewpoint, and what is better for the purpose than the use of the inductive method? Place information concerning prohibition where it is easily available—in the public library. Send one dollar and fifty cents to THE UNION SIGNAL for a year's subscription. Any union can afford to risk that sum. It is not a fortune, and it may yield rich dividends. Invest today!

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

FEDERAL LEGISLATION PROPOSED FOR EMERGENCY—SOLDIERS' COMPENSATION BILL IN CONFERENCE—NEWEST SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA — DEPARTMENT REORGANIZATION STILL ON PROGRAM — WOMAN NAMED AS U. S. APPRAISER — WORK OF DISMANTLING FIVE BATTLESHIPS BEGINS

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Federal Legislation Proposed for Emergency

The Winslow Bill for control and distribution of coal during the mining and transportation emergency was passed this week by the House, 214 to 61, and sent to the Senate. This bill gives the President the right, after issuing a presidential proclamation declaring the present emergency no longer in existence, to proclaim the existence of another such emergency without asking leave of Congress. The Sander's amendment provided that the life of the law should end January 21, 1924. The Borah Bill, which contains certain recommendations not in the Winslow Bill, in regard to the standardization of living and working conditions in the industry, has been offered in the Senate as a substitute for the Winslow Bill.

Soldiers' Compensation Bill in Conference

The Soldiers' Compensation Bill is on its way, but its final fate is still unknown. Both friend and foe find satisfaction in the recorded vote as given in the Senate this week. The vote was 47 to 22, with 27 members absent or not voting. In the vote the foes can see enough votes that can be mustered to prevent passage over a possible presidential veto, and the friends can see that the number of Senators supporting the bonus exceeded by one the necessary two-thirds majority, of those present and voting, to override a veto. The latest rumor is that the McNary Land Reclamation Amendment, which provides for an extensive program of land reclamation and gives former service men preferential rights in settling upon the lands, and the Simmons Amendment providing for payment of the bonus with interest on foreign indebtedness to the United States, may be modified or eliminated in conference and the bill put into such shape on the basis of the proposed insurance certificate plan as to insure an early agreement on it in both Senate and House.

It is venturesome to predict what will happen in Congress from one day to the next, such unexpected things having taken place during the past two weeks. The bill is in conference, and before this reaches you, it may become a statute.

Passage of the Bonus Bill clears the decks in the Senate for the legislation proposed to meet strike situations. The Senate after the consideration of this emergency legislation will tackle the Liberian Loan Bill; the Capper-Tincher Grain Futures Bill; and the Dyer Lynching Bill.

The Newest Senator from Pennsylvania

Major David A. Reed, the new Senator from Pennsylvania, has the distinction of being the youngest man in the Senate, save one, Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi, who is forty-one years of age, while Senator Reed is forty-two years of age. Mr. Reed is Republican nominee for the regular term to be filled at the November election, and is one of the two World War veterans in the Senate, Senator Davis Elkins being the other.

For the third time within a year, the Senate witnessed the induction into office of a new Senator from Pennsylvania. Mr. Philander C. Knox died last October and was succeeded by Mr. William E. Crow, and Mr. George Wharton Pepper came to the Senate as a successor of Mr. Boies Penrose, who passed away New Year's Eve. Major Reed succeeded Senator Crow, who died recently. All these senators were appointed by Governor William Sproul, theonly state executive in the history of the country to name three members of the Senate in so short a time.

A Postal Economy

Postmaster General Work declares in favor of ownership by the department of every postoffice building, in the country; that is, of every building that houses a postoffice. He has examined leases of buildings or parts of buildings occupied as postoffices, and finds that the rentals for ten and twenty years would in many instances have paid for the building. If the government pays rent for a building until it virtually pays for the building, it must commit the extravagance of continuing the payment. This is not thrifty, as banks, real estate men and others interested, not alone financially, but altruistically, in the welfare of our people, are continually telling the wage earner. The "buy a home" movement is just as economical for the government in the case of an activity like the postoffice as it is for the private individual depending upon his daily work for his shelter and support. For the government to keep on paying rent for a building or a part of it after it has already paid enough to buy the building is foolish.

Department Reorganization Still on Program

The big plan to authorize through Congress reorganization of government departments along lines suggested by a special committee is said to be "very much alive" although it is not to be urged at the present session. The emergency situation in which the country finds itself today is almost exclusively occupying the minds of the legislators.

Navy Not Waiting for Ratification of Treaty

Five battleships designated by the Washington armament conference for the scrap heap are being stripped in navy yards at Mare Island, California, and Boston, and when finally dismantled will be appraised and the hulks offered for sale at public auction.

The ships are the "Virginia" and the "New Jersey," at Boston, the "Rhode Island," the "Nebraska" and the "Georgia," at Mare Island. While they were specifically designated in the naval treaty for junking, they are among the oldest fighting ships in the navy, and probably would have been declared obsolete and scrapped independently of the conference action. It was for this reason, naval officials explained, rather than the treaty provisions, formal ratifications of which have not been exchanged, that the naval board of inspection and survey decided to begin work of dismantling them.

Bootleggers' Liquor Deadly

"The increased death rate from alcoholism, indicated by figures tabulated by the New York State Department of Health, is attributable to poisonous concoctions which unscrupulous bootleggers are peddling," says Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes.

The total number of deaths in New York state from such poisoning for 1922 to date is 122, as compared with 145 for the entire year of 1921. Members of the state hospital commission say there is no doubt that insanity will show an increase this year, as 1921 showed an increase of seventy-one over the previous year, due in great measure to the deadly poison of liquor now on the illicit market.

Miss Florence E. Smith, who has been in the employ of the U. S. Government since 1875, was given a happy farewell by associates on her retirement from the service. For nearly half a century this indefatigable worker was in the proud employ of the Postoffice Department. She declares that it distresses her to hear people speak disparagingly of government service.

Chicago's Health Commissioner Placards Houses of Vice

Health Commissioner Bundesen of Chicago is quarantining all houses in which men and women are found with venereal diseases, by nailing thereon a flaming red and black warning sign. It reads:

"Venereal Disease—Keep Out. All persons are hereby notified of the presence of venereal disease within and are warned not to enter. The person having venereal disease must not leave the apartment until the warning sign has been removed.

"This warning must not be concealed from public view, or mutilated or defaced, and must remain posted until removed by the health department.

"Penalty for violation of rules of quarantine: Fine of up to $200, imprisonment of six months, or both."

Boston Police Commissioner Warns Policemen Against Drinking

A warning has been issued by the police commissioner of the city of Boston, Herbert A. Wilson, to the effect that any police officer found under the influence of intoxicating liquor will be dismissed from the force. "While on duty he must not and while off duty he should not indulge in its use," says Mr. Wilson, as quoted by press reports, "inasmuch as even one drink is sufficient to render a man unfit for duty. The community at large must be protected." It is the commissioner's opinion that a police officer under the influence of liquor, with a club and a loaded revolver on his person, is a menace to society.

Rochester, (N. Y.) Conducts Law Enforcement Campaign

In the early part of the summer, under the leadership of Clinton N. Howard, the city of Rochester, New York, entered upon a campaign to bring about law enforcement. The battle opened with a great mass meeting, at which Mr. Howard, who had been gathering evidence, presented his facts, naming places which were violating the law with impunity, and challenged the public officials to do their duty. On the following day he was summoned before a crowded city court, where he gave information which was supported by sworn affidavits. As the outcome of this publicity, a committee of twenty-five prominent citizens, headed by Dr. Albert W. Beaven, was authorized by the mass meeting to become responsible for the moral reformation of the city by holding the public officials to constant accountability, and support was given the campaign by the daily press, especially in the news columns and editorials of the Rochester Times-Union, which has the largest newspaper circulation in the city. The campaign has gone steadily on through the summer, saloons have been closed by injunction, raids have been made, and the cause of prohibition has received great impetus.

The Dry West Cannot Be Laughed Out of Its Convictions

William Allen White

(Excerpts from "The Dry West to the Thirsty East" in Collier's Weekly, September 2)

A considerable majority of the states, and probably a decent majority of the people of the United States, believe in prohibition as an economic measure. These states enacted prohibition laws and went through about the same revolutionary experience that Kansas had in legal enactments and enforcing agencies. The history of prohibition in Kansas is not essentially different from the history of prohibition in Colorado, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, or Texas, and the States of the Southeast and the Northwest. What Kansas did in forty years, these states did in ten. Prohibition to Ohio and Michigan came quickly, and it has been sustained in a popular referendum.

Senators and Congressmen from Mississippi Valley states and from the South and from the Mountain States and the Pacific Coast States are going to stand by the views of their constituents, because these views are largely the views of these Senators and Congressmen themselves. It is idle to say they are demagogues. They are not. It is idle to say that the people of the West and South are overcome by a mania, or carried away by a fad, or overborne by a wave of sentimentalism. They are fundamentally convinced against the saloon and have been for from ten to twenty years committed against any edging into our national life of anything that looks like a saloon, or anything that is owned by the men who used to maintain the saloon —by the brewers, for instance.

In every community west of the Alleghenies, hundreds of men and women have served on law and order committees, have given money to gather evidence against violators of the prohibitory law, have spent their time and energy and funds to make prohibition a success. These men are not cranks, but business men, farmers, professional men, railroad officers, bankers—good middle-class folks. They acted as they did somewhat because they believed in prohibition, but largely because they believed in the Constitution and in a decent and orderly observance of law. They were inspired by the oldest tradition of the Anglo-Saxon people.

They cannot be laughed out of their convictions, nor scared away from their purpose, nor fooled by fine talk about light wines and beer. They feel deeply that light wines and beer means the return of the old-fashioned saloon and nothing less, and that if you cannot maintain absolute prohibition, you cannot enforce partial prohibition with a saloon where light wines and beer are sold as a rendezvous of the bootlegger of hard liquor! They fear that the same bootlegging agencies which tried to overthrow prohibition, the same agencies against which men and women in these western communities have been fighting from ten to forty years, will come back with light wines and beer.

* * * *

Kansas and thirty states of her tradition and kind would no more lose their forty years' fight for prohibition than they would lose their four years' fight against slavery.

No Vacation for the Wet Forces

Throughout the past summer, whatever may be said of the prohibitionists, the brewers, distillers, winemakers, and imbibers of intoxicating liquors have not ceased their work. In fact, one of the leaders of the wets stated recently that the anti-prohibition workers are better organized than they have ever been. His views, as quoted by the Christian Science Monitor, show that national prohibition has not only forced the enemies of prohibition to cleave together, but it has made them " forge new weapons and adopt the methods of the dry forces."

One new policy of the wets is the quizzing of Congressional candidates. In the years when they put up their hardest fights, 1913-1916, they made the most careful investigation of the records of candidates, their associations, and their influence, and then, in the light of their findings, came out with recommendations for Congress, and published the word to their friends, far and wide. Today, as by tactics, they are seeking an actual pledge from their men to stand for modification of prohibition, and are endeavoring to win over, by their show of strength, all those candidates who have weak convictions.

Another change from their olden methods concerns publicity. Formerly, most of the business of the wets was done in secrecy, but today, whatever plans are made and executed behind the scenes, the letterhead of the A. A. P. A. shows a list of prominent people who are openly claiming membership in its organization, and the old wet organizations which are still alive are pouring their strength into the newer societies. Much "wet" literature is being distributed, but appeals are more largely made by means of personal letters and the petitions now being circulated.

The first effort is always to obtain nominations to Congress for known wet sympathizers, and to secure this end the anti-drys have not spared, nor are they sparing, any pains, appealing to women and men, voters of all parties, alike.

And let not the states which have held their primaries, and succeeded in nominating dry candidates, think that there is no further need for watchfulness, for though the effort to replace those members of Congress who have committed themselves to prohibition by their votes, by well-known wets, is the first move of the anti-prohibitionists, when the primaries have not effected such results, and the dry candidates have won out, every possible influence is then to be brought to bear on them to cause them to change their allegiance. It is to be a fight all along the line, and at no point is the firing to cease. The wet organizations declare openly that they will throw their strength to those candidates, regardless of party affiliations, who show "wet" inclinations, and will do everything in their power to elect them.

In the various states, the backing for the wet candidates is a plain indication of the regime which may be expected to follow their election. In California, it is claimed that bootleggers are contributing heavily to a fund to bring back wine and beer, and that the leaders of the wine grape associations are working for the defeat of the Wright Act, that illicit traffic may continue to flourish in that state. The statement of an official of the New York division of the A. A. P. A. that "it is the moral, religious, and civic duty of every good citizen to refuse obedience to the Volstead Act," is going the rounds of the press. In Boston, the National Liberal Alliance, according to the chamber of commerce (which, because of its self-styled "referendum on the Eighteenth Amendment" investigated its history), distributed its straw ballots, and collected its votes, largely in places known to have sold liquor before the

A NEW STUDY OF LIFE INSURANCE STATISTICS

Cora Frances Stoddard

The amount of new life insurance written in the United States is said to have increased from less than eight billion dollars worth in 1918 to more than thirteen billion in 1921. It reflects increase in income and increased intent to save for the future welfare of dependents, possibly, also, increased ability to save. Young men more and more realize the importance of taking out policies early while they are in good health and when insurance costs less than later in life.

Physical condition and habits are of prime importance when one tries to secure insurance. A recent compilation of the experience of insurance companies on three continents by Dr. Oscar H. Rogers, medical director of the New York Life Insurance Company, points out definitely the disadvantage that even so called "moderate drinking" is to the insured man—and to the man who would be insured—and also to the insurance companies.

The experience of seven British, Australian, and American companies shows that the non-abstainers had an average mortality 32 per cent higher than the abstainers. "However freely we allow for considerations of moderation practiced by abstainers in food and every manner of living," says Dr. Rogers, "there must still remain a substantial margin of difference due to alcohol alone."

The Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company studied its statistics in a way to give a clearer view of what happened within the groups of non-abstainers. About 85 per cent of the group were not even daily drinkers and never used more than two glasses of spirits or three glasses of beer in a day. The "regular beer drinkers" used one or more glasses a day (never more than four in one day) or drank five in the course of a week; this class also used wine moderately.

In terms of the mortality of total abstainers here were the results:

Total abstainers 100%
Moderate, i. e., occasional drinkers 119%
Daily users of beer.....133%
Daily users of spirits.....166%

Other companies show a similar trend.

"There were no really hard drinkers and no drunkards," says the report. "All of such extreme cases were excluded from membership in the companies. The evidence before us is conclusive that the so-called limit of three tablespoonfuls of alcohol a day is far too liberal. Indeed, there appears to be no limit within which alcohol may be entirely harmless. It is as if there were a direct relation between the amount of alcohol used and the amount of damage done the body. The evidence is strong also that the damage done persists long after drinking is discontinued.

"Anyone who uses alcohol now or has used it in the past, is a less desirable risk, all other things being equal, than a total abstainer, and his undesirability is in proportion to the freedom with which he has used the drug."

In view of these facts and conclusions, the young man who asserts his personal liberty to drink is increasingly likely to find himself subjected to searching scrutiny when he presents himself as an applicant for life insurance.

The report brings out a new point—concrete evidence as to the cost of insuring the drinkers whose mortality is excessive. For this Dr. Rogers uses statistics of the Medico-Actuarial investigation. He concludes that in the period observed, the excessive number of deaths among the class of "free, daily" drinkers cost the insurance companies about $[illegible],000; the "quite moderate daily users" caused a probable financial loss of at least $530,000. The financial loss from insuring those engaged in various forms of the liquor trade "must have been somewhere in the neighborhood of $2,500,000. This loss occurred in spite of every effort on the part of the companies to prevent it. It was well known when these persons were insured that the occupations were unhealthful and accordingly, the risks must have been selected with the utmost care." Nevertheless, this very large loss due to the drinkers and the drink traffickers occurred. Had the losses not been distributed through several companies and several years "the financial results would have been a very serious matter. As it is, they are only mentioned to give a clearer idea of the extent to which attempts to insure these risks have proven a financial burden to the business of insurance."

The abolition of the liquor traffic ought to reduce these losses of one of our great financial institutions.

TWENTY YEARS OF TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION

Arthur Lee, Superintendent Public Schools, Clinton, Missouri

The aim of this article is to give a brief summary of twenty years' experience with scientific temperance instruction in one system of public schools, that of Clinton, Missouri, and some conclusions drawn as to its value.

Throughout this entire period, Mrs. I. F. Massie has had charge of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union's part in this combined endeavor of the schools and that society. Her kindly and helpful co-operation are greatly appreciated.

During these years, thousands of children have had thorough instruction in the effects of stimulants and narcotics on the human body. About twenty thousand essays on the subject have been written. Boys and girls who have gone through the eight grades of the elementary school, and the four years of high school, have had this instruction every year of their twelve years of school life and it has been fixed in their minds by writing twelve papers on the topic. Over two hundred gold medals have been given by the W. C. T. U. for the best essays.

This work has been handled for so long that the instruction, and the writing of the essays, have become systematized. The first thing done each year, after the subjects for essays are announced, is to collect and distribute material from which the teachers will give the classroom instruction. Although we have been accumulating material year by year, our supply is still inadequate. The deficiency was evident this spring when the two hundred students of our high school besieged the school library for reading on the effects of tobacco.

The basis of our collection of material is various texts on physiology and hygiene. We also have a number of health books, written for the use of the general public, that contain good chapters on stimulants and narcotics. One of the best of this type of books is Fisher and Fisk's "How to Live" (Funk & Wagnalls Co.) Our local W. C. T. U. has bought a number of books and given them to the school. We also make use of many of the tracts and leaflets published by the national organization. Individual teachers, the library, and the superintendent's office have made collections of their own, and contributed them to the general fund.

Previous to the beginning of the instruction period, packages of books and articles are allotted to the various rooms. In order that the material may go farther, the time assigned for the work in the high school is immediately after the close of the period in the elementary school. This enables us to use in the upper grades and the high school a good deal of the same material.

A schedule is made in the office, specifying the number of lessons to be given, the days upon which they are to be taught, the days for writing the first draft of the essays, the time for the teacher to correct the essays, for the writing of the second draft, and for sending to the office the essays to be submitted in the medal contest.

All of the writing of both the first and the second drafts is required to be done at school. This does away with the temptation of parents to give children undue help. It also prevents the accusation that the winning essays are copied, or are the work of older people.

From the packages of material that they have received, the teachers prepare a number of lesson plans. The lessons are given in talks by the teacher, in conversations between pupils and teacher, and in regular question-and-answer recitations on matter that the teacher has previously presented, or the pupils have read. The instruction is given in the time of the classes in physiology, in the grades where this subject is taught. In other grades, and all through the high school, the instruction is given in the English classes. Principal emphasis is laid on that phase of the subject with which the W. C. T. U. essay topics of the year deal. Sometimes teaching outlines are sent out from the office. In the high school the essay subjects are used for oral composition, before the class writing on them. Students are designated to prepare, and give before the class, a fif-

"The safety of the republic rests to a large degree with the teachers of the nation. We call upon teachers everywhere to teach respect for law and order and for constituted authority; to impress alike upon young and old the importance of obedience to the Constitution and to all state and national laws and to local ordinances; to teach the children that laws are made by the majority; and may be changed by the majority; but that they must be obeyed by all; and that he who disobeys the Constitution or laws is an enemy of the republic."—Resolution Passed by National Education Association

MINORITY WILL TIRE OF OPPOSITION AND FALL IN LINE FOR ENFORCEMENT OF THE LAW

Mabel Walker Willebrandt, Assistant U. S. Attorney-General

I am very willing to do my best toward promoting the excellent cause of prohibition. Replying to the questions asked of me by THE UNION SIGNAL:

1. It has been my experience and observation that prohibition has produced perhaps its most benoficent results on the home life and welfare of women and children. A great deal is always heard about the personal liberty of the workingman that is taken away by prohibiting his glass of beer. When I hear such remarks, I think always, "What about the personal liberty of his wife and children?" For usually the workingman is obliged, because the wage he receives is inadequate to secure luxuries for himself and children, to indulge in this kind of personal liberty at the expense of his family. It has been my observation that there are more family parties at the movies, more times when the workingman's family finds an opportunity to enjoy an outing together by reason of the money saved by the father because of the closing of the saloons.

For several years I was connected with the public defense of women accused of crime, in the Los Angeles courts. Prior to prohibition there would average ten to a dozen women brought in per night for drunkenness. Subsequent to prohibition, and particularly during the years 1919 and 1920, there would not average an drunken women per month.

2. The attitude of by far the larger number of women with whom I come in contact is either secretly or openly in favor of prohibition. It is true that quite a large percentage of those who are secretly in favor of prohibition statutes do in small ways commit technical violation of the Volstead Act. Opinions on public questions of morals, outside of sexual morality, cannot be divided according to the sexes. By far the greater number of men with whom I come in contact, are friendly to prohibition, as are a somewhat larger percentage of the women.

3. It is my personal opinion that national prohibition promotes the health, prosperity and happiness of family and social life. I believe we are passing through a transition period during which the minority who opposed national prohibition are unusually active, unusually loud-voiced in their opposition and restive under the restraint the Volstead Act imposes upon them. But restlessness and discontent are due to the violent activity of the minority who are fighting their last stand. They are not due to increased crime. The closing of jails and penitentiaries and the study of statistics of crime establish such a conclusion.

There is one sure element in the American character that can be counted upon to tide us through any period of unrest which is produced when a considerable minority is defeated in the passage of a law, or the adoption of a national policy. That American characteristic of which I speak is good sportsmanship. When you view the good sportsmanship and deeplying patriotism displayed by the southern minority after the close of the Civil War, out of which has been produced a loyal south as devoted to Federal interests as any other part of the country, and when you further realize that that good sportsmanship and patriotism had to struggle up through intense social hardship, bitter financial losses, and personal grief, occasioned by sacrifice to a lost cause, then you realize that the minority who opposed the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment, if their opposition arose because of a sincere difference of opinion, will fall into line with the program of law enforcement.

Many of these are foreigners; if so, they have proved unworthy of American opportunities and should be returned to a country where the peculiar kind of personal liberty fits their type of mind.

No quarter should be given that group who opposed the Eighteenth Amendment, not from principle, but only from selfishness, and who now are taking advantage of unsettled conditions for the purpose of forming criminal conspiracies to violate established law.

Let us not overlook the real issue that underlies all the contest that wages around prohibition. In the last analysis it is Americanism in conflict with old world customs and concept; it is democracy against avarice, lawlessness and anarchy. The issue divides men not upon the question of their appetites but upon the question of their loyalty to their country; it is no longer whether we are wet or dry—it is whether we are American or un-American; whether we are for the Constitution and the laws of our land, or for our personal convenience or self-indulgence.

ROY A. HAYNES,
Federal Prohibition Commissioner.

FEDERAL AND STATE COOPERATION FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT

Arthur J. Tuttle, Judge United States District Court, Detroit, Michigan

I am glad to discuss the national prohibition law, briefly, as follows:

1. As a private citizen with two eyes, I feel no hesitancy in saying that the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law have greatly reduced intoxication in Michigan.

2. I do not think the question of the validity and necessity for law enforcement is open to discussion. I have been on the Federal bench in this district for nearly ten years, and during that period I have charged fifty grand juries. I believe that on every occasion I have made the statement that, while too frequently ordinances passed by cities, and statutes passed by state legislatures, were treated as dead laws and not enforced because some certain community or group of public officials did not like the particular law, yet no law ever enacted by the Congress of the United States had been treated as a dead law, but on every occasion and with reference to every statute there had been an honest effort, and in a very large measure a successful effort, to enforce every law placed on the statute books of the United States. I have laid down the challenge that if any law on the statute books of the United States was not being enforced I would like to be advised of the same. To the present time, no individual, or group of individuals, has ever challenged the accuracy of my statement.

3. I have said, and I now say, that the only manner in which the numerous criminal statutes passed by Congress in recent years can be enforced is by a very full and complete co-operation with the state authorities. In recent years, beginning back with the days of the great Theodore Roosevelt, there has been a turning to the Federal government for relief, whenever the people felt that they were not receiving proper protection under existing state laws. Examples are the Car Seal Act, the Mann Act, the Dyar Act, the Food and Drug Act, the Migratory Bird Law, and now the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law, all of which brought additional work and responsibility to the Federal machinery of government.

4. This swing of the pendulum to the side of the Federal government is presenting some very serious problems, which are deserving of careful thought and consideration.

It will be noted that while the laws mentioned above have all found their right to existence in some clause of the Constitution of the United States, the same wrongs come within the police power of the state, being covered by state statutes. A consideration of the problem of how to enforce these laws leads me to think of the subject in three separate divisions as follows:

(a) Unaided by the enforcement of state laws by state courts and state officers, it would be impossible for the Federal machinery, as now constituted, to thoroughly and satisfactorily enforce all of these Federal laws. If all the violations of the laws enumerated above were to be brought into this court, it would require not one judge, but many, many judges to handle the work. The same would be true of other departments of government.

(b) If the remedy is to be without the assistance of state laws and the enforcement thereof by state officers, it means the creating of several thousands of additional Federal officers in this District and millions of additional Federal officers in the United States of America. This is not practicable.

(c) The thing which is now being done with a large measure of success must, in my judgment, be carried further and the people must be brought to a full understanding of the necessity of proceeding by this third method, which I call complete co-operation between state and Federal officers. It is entitled to our encouragement and commendation.

In the future, as in the past, the great majority of the wrongs done by people must be taken care of in the state courts by state officers. I do not think it is a good thing for the people to get the notion that they carry no personal responsibility in regard to the matter. If things are going wrong in their community, and their local state officers do not clean up the situation, they should "get busy" and replace those state officers with men of efficiency and integrity.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION LIST OF DELEGATES GROWING DAILY—EVERY SECTION OF THE WORLD TO BE REPRESENTED

Philadelphia, "the city of sisterly love," is soon to be the center of the W. C. T. U. universe, and the eyes of white ribboners of all nations are turning toward it, with high expectations. The list of foreign delegates to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention is increasing rapidly. Comrades are coming from Canada, England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, Denmark, Norway, Finland, Sweden, Egypt, South Africa, Syria, Japan, China, India, Australia, New Zealand and Uruguay and Argentina, South America.

The phenomenal progress of prohibition in India will be the theme of the speakers from there, and Miss Mary Campbell, World's W. C. T. U. organizer, the author of "The Power House of Pathankot," will tell the story of the miraculous transformations wrought in whole native communities as the result of sowing the seed of total abstinence truths.

"I move you that caste be banished from this sacred place, that we may be brethren united to put down an evil that is ruining our homes and country," was the plea of a high caste Hindoo, chief magistrate of the town, at a meeting to organize for temperance, over which Miss Campbell was presiding. When a high caste Hindoo is willing to break down the age-old barriers of caste to promote the temperance cause, it is an indication that the work has a sure and strong hold upon India.

Miss Mary Campbell, World's W. C. T. U. Organizer

Miss Campbell tells of her surp e shortly after this meeting, at receivin a call from the British Chief Magistrat f the district, who held sway over 20, 0 souls. He was on a tour of the territ y over which he had control, and not o y expressed his interest and sympathy n the movement she had helped to st t but asked modestly, "Would you be v l- ing to take me in as an honorary mem r of the temperance society?"

Other members of the delegation fr n India are Miss Mabel Archibald, editor f the India Temperance Record; Mrs. C. . Hill, Miss H. Davies, M.D.; Mrs. J. Du - man, Mrs. D. E. Alter and Miss Hele t. Root.

The World's Convention is to be h d in the Academy of Music, not ma y blocks distant from the famous In - pendence Hall, which houses the Libe y Bell.

The National W. C. T. U. Conventi , which is to immediately follow e World's gathering, will be held in e Chambers Wylie Memorial Presbyter a Church, Philadelphia.

From these meetings many delega s will go to Toronto, Canada, to attend t e World's League Against Alcoholism, to e held November 24-29.

WHY NOT PERMIT THE TRAFFIC IN BEER?

At one of the mass meetings held in New York under the auspices of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, a popular song ran like this:

"Something's in the air,
Yes, it's everywhere,
It's the thing we are waiting for.
Soon the good old wine,
And the brimming stein
Will come back to us once more."

The real purpose and raison d'etre of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment has been summed up by Colonel Stayton, its leader, in these words: "I want my beer and I don't care a —— who knows it."

Why not allow such poor thirsty creatures as the redoubtable colonel, who have so few resources that they can't be happy without their beer, to have the beverage? Why not gratify them by modifying the Volstead Law to permit the return of beer?

Let five well known authorities answer:

DR. HARVEY WILEY says, "I am unalterably opposed to a resumption of the liquor traffic, even the re-entry of light wines and beer. I think beer is probably the most dangerous to health of all the ordinary alcoholic liquors. I do not know anybody who favors the return of the saloon, and beer without a distributor is a useless commodity, and with a distributor it is a dangerous commodity."

CHIEF JUSTICE WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT of the United States Supreme Court says: "I am not in favor of amending the Volstead Act in respect to the amount of permissible alcohol in beverages. I am not in favor of allowing light wines and beer to be sold under the Eighteenth Amendment. I believe it would defeat the purpose of the Amendment. No such distinction as that between wines and beer on the one hand, and spirituous liquors on the other, is practicable as a police measure. Any such loophole as light wines and beer would make the Amendment a laughing stock."

That the permission to traffic in so-called low alcoholic liquors only opens the way to the manufacture of all intoxicants has been proven by history. The Iowa State Capital, one of the leading papers of the state, said recently:

"All persons acquainted with the history of Iowa probably are familiar with the fact that Iowa had a beer and light wine law during one of her periods of prohibition agitation. The law did not seem to work well, for the reason that persons authorized to sell beer and wine usually violated the law by selling hard liquors. The result was that Iowa soon declared the sale of beer and light wine to be a failure."

"Alcohol is alcohol, either in whisky or beer," says DR. EUGENE LYMAN FISK, of the Life Extension Institute. "It is nonsense to claim that beer is a hygienic drink. It is drunk chiefly for its alcoholic effect, and if the alcoholic effect is produced the danger of alcohol exists. Any one who doubts that beer can produce a certain form of intoxication need only visit the saloon and watch the beer-drinker in various stages of befuddlement or excitement. If beer does not intoxicate or produce any alcoholic effect, what becomes of the 'racial craving for stimulants' which it is said to satisfy? Furthermore, heavy beer-drinking, as in the case of brewery employes, adds the danger of excessive fluid intake, entirely apart from alcohol. The heavy mortality of brewery employes is sufficient evidence that beer, so far as its effect on masses of men is concerned, is not a hygienic drink."

LEWIS JEROME JOHNSON, M.AM. SOC. C. E., professor of Civil Engineering, Harvard University, is reported by the American Issue to have said: "I am firmly opposed to any concessions whatever to beer and wine. Beer and wine were understood to be intoxicating liquors when the Eighteenth Amendment was submitted and ratified. ...There is nothing that can be said today for beer and wine that was not under conside - tion when the Eighteenth Amendme : was adopted and for two generations - fore as well. The beer and wine thec has lost along with the rest."

U. S. CONGRESSMAN A. J. VO - STEAD says: "It is a part of the hist - of this country that for many years bitter and persistent struggle has be carried on against the liquor traffic. T Prohibition Amendment was the cul - nation of the struggle. Before its ad - tion, many states had amendments their constitutions prohibiting the traf These amendments are substantially the same language as the Federal P hibition Amendment. The legislatur of these states, more than thirty in nu ber, passed statutes to carry these amer ments into effect. Not one permitted t sale of beer or light wines that contain more than one per cent of alcohol volume; and with the exception of o or two, in which the language of t statutes might possibly be construed permit the sale of a liquor containi one per cent, they all forbade the sa of any beer or wine that contained mo than one-half of one per cent of alcoh

....The argument that a law allowi the sale of beer and wine would enab the government to collect a large tax delusive. Most of the states have prol bition laws today that could not be r pealed; public sentiment in those stat would not permit it. Without the co sent of the states, beer and wine cou not be sold, despite anything that Co gress could do. Without open sale the states, no substantial tax could collected. Fourteen states forbid t sale of beer and wine whether they ha any alcohol in them or not, as do al Alaska and the District of Columbi Twenty-two states forbid the sale of a beer or wine that has more than one-ha of one per cent of alcohol. Seven stat provide that the definition in the nation prohibition act shall govern."

NATIONAL PROHIBITION HAS COME TO STAY, DECLARE NATIONAL WOMEN LEADERS AND EDUCATORS

INTELLIGENT WOMEN WILL NEVER VOTE FOR REPEAL

Mrs. Philip North Moore, President National Council of Women

There is no question in the minds of women who have thoroughly investigated the returns from the Eighteenth Amendment, as to its value to the world at large.

We cannot believe for a moment that intelligent women of this country will vote to repeal either the Amendment or the interpretation as now in force.

In 59 cities, of over 30,000 population, including New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, etc., the total number of arrests for drunkenness in 1917 was 316,842, and in 1920, only 109,768.

In Bellevue Hospital in 1917 over thirty per cent of all cases were for alcoholism; in 1920, six per cent.

In the same hospital, insanity due to alcoholism decreased from ten per cent in 1917 to two per cent in 1920.

The New York Health department reported 680 alcoholic deaths in the year 1917, and only sixty-nine in 1920.

These are only a few of the returns we can quote. I may mention one further point—that a strict enforcement of the law would result in a still greater difference for the tabulation of 1921-1922.

We certainly look to the future with hope.

WELFARE OF HOME IMPROVED

Ellen Pendleton, President Wellesley College

My experience has not been such as to give me any personal knowledge of the effect of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. From all I can learn, however, I judge that the home life and welfare of women and children, especially among the wage-earning class, have been vastly bettered. Moveover, so far as I know, even though some may not have thought the Volstead Act a wise one, they believe that the law should be enforced, and have no desire to alter the Eighteenth Amendment. My belief is that even with the present inefficient enforcement of the law, the situation has been vastly improved.

VALUE OF PROHIBITION BEYOND HUMAN CALCULATION

Josephine Corliss Preston, State Superintendent Public Instruction for Washington

No other one factor has done more to better conditions in homes and resulted in greater improvement in the welfare of women and children than has national prohibition.

To the best of my knowledge this attitude is universal among not only the prominent women leaders of my acquaintance, but among people in all walks of life.

The value of national prohibition as an agent in promoting the health, prosperity, and happiness of the family and society generally, cannot be estimated. It is beyond mere human calculation. It should be the constant endeavor of every person to aid in furthering the cause of temperance and to hold high the national standard of prohibition as set forth in the Eighteenth Amendment.

A FORCE THAT CAN BE RELIED UPON—THE WOMEN VOTERS OF THE COUNTRY

Major Roy A Haynes, Federal Prohibition Commissioner

With the passage of the nineteenth amendment the women of the country came into their long delayed rights of citizenship and at that moment there entered into the realm of our political life a force that can always be relied upon to exert itself on the right side of every moral or social question. Beyond the peradventure of a doubt the women of this country can be depended upon either at the polls or in the jury box to cast their vote for law and rigid law enforcement.—Excerpt from address delivered at Ocean Grove, N. J., August 17.

PROHIBITION AN INESTIMABLE BLESSING

Mary Antin, Author and Lecturer

The difficulties that have been encountered in enforcing the prohibition law are in my mind no argument whatever in favor of restoration of the liquor traffic. It was very difficult at one time to clear the seas of pirates, and yet that was not taken as an argument in favor of permitting piracy to endure. All the pains of readjustment to which this generation may be subjected will be but a small price to pay for the inestimable blessing of a world that shall have forgotten it was once under the sway of the drink evil. —Manufacturers Record.

RESULTS FAR-REACHING

May Trumper, State Superintendent Public Instruction for Montana

My experience and observations have been that prohibition has greatly improved the conditions of home life in many families and has greatly benefited the welfare of women and children. The women of my acquaintance are certainly most kindly disposed toward the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead law. The apparently unanimous action taken at the recent meeting of the Montana State Federation of Women's Clubs, endorsing the Volstead law and approving of the provisions of the Eighteenth Amendment, certainly indicate the sentiment on this subject of representative women in this state.

There is no question in my mind but that within a very few years national prohibition is going to serve to increase the prosperity of the country and to better the general conditions of society. It is difficult to learn of the benefits which have resulted when the people who have been most helped are not the ones who talk about it, and the ones who wish to injure the cause are occupying so much of the stage with their publicity in opposition to the laws. The issue is clear, however, and the results of the Amendment and the Volstead law will be far reaching and definite if the public does not permit its vision to be clouded by the propaganda being circulated everywhere.

UNITED STATES A PROHIBITION COUNTRY FOREVER

Carrie Chapman Catt, President International Suffrage Alliance

Prohibition has come to stay in the United States. It is true that the law is violated as yet in the large cities, but the cities only came under the law when it was made national. Long before, vast stretches of territory were made dry by local option.

In my native state of Iowa, prohibition was first enacted nearly forty years ago. The opponents were not resigned and battles over the enforcement of the law were fought at every election for many years, but public opinion has grown continuously stronger for the law, which now is supported by practically all the population and admirably enforced.

The manufacturers and retailers of liquor are doing their best to discredit the law and its enforcement, but one may be completely assured that this will be a prohibition country forever.

We have found that drink creates crime, poverty and insanity, and the majority of voters are convinced that it is more sensible to shut up the saloons and thus lessen the cost of jails, courts and asylums. Does it accomplish these results? It does. Even in this very trying after-war period a marked decrease in drunkenness is evident, and that, too, in the wettest spots.

NEVER SAW INTOXICATED MAN IN KANSAS

Lorraine Elizabeth Wooster, State Superintendent Public Instruction for Kansas

We have had prohibition in Kansas ever since I can remember. I grew up here, and have never seen a drunken man or a saloon in the state. The first drunken person I ever saw was in Colorado, and the sight was pitiful and terrible to me. The record of Kansas is that of a healthy, cheerful, moral, intelligent, thrifty people, and I notice the states that have not had prohibition as long as Kansas, do not have records as good as ours, and the records of the orphans' homes and those for cripples, etc., are distressing, for they have not room sufficient to care for these children, who are said to be in that condition as the result of drunken parents.

The women of Kansas stand for prohibition, and always will stand for it. National prohibition will give us a better class of people, and I hope it will give us more Americans, for most of the people who are against prohibition are not Americans, and should be deported. I would be glad to see them moving to their "Fatherland" rapidly, and if necessary, I would be willing to pay the transportation for some of them if that would aid them to move more rapidly.

If one will search the records of the jails, the almshouses, homes for the cripples, etc., I think he will get the best evidence for prohibition. The United States is not noted for taking backward steps, and I am for America for Americans, and if it becomes necessary, in order to maintain prohibition in the United States, I would rejoice if some means could be found of disposing of and freeing the country from the undesirable citizens who wish liquor and all the improper acts that go with it.

CALL TO PRAYER

DEVOTIONAL DAY—NOVEMBER 12, 1922—FOR THE WORLD'S AND NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTIONS

In exultant thanksgiving to the Lord God of Hosts for marvelous victories achieved, and in humble and reverent dependence upon Divine guidance, we, the General Officers of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the United States hereby designate Sunday, November 12, as Devotional Day for the coming conventions to meet in Philadelphia, Nov. 11-19.

On the afternoon of Devotional Day, in the Academy of Music, a great inspirational service, with eminent speakers from many lands, will be held. W. C. T. U. members everywhere are earnestly requested to be in fervent fellowship with this gathering, praying that it may give a compelling spiritual keynote for the meetings that will follow.

We urge local unions to give publicity to this international call to prayer and to assemble on Devotional Day, inviting missionary societies and others to cooperate with them. The pastors of many churches of all denominations will doubtless consider it a privilege to preach on law enforcement and world prohibition, emphasizing the importance of our W. C. T. U. conventions and requesting prayer for their widespread spiritual influence.

Our call is issued with more than the customary appeal. It is a challenge to action in a crucial campaign year. In this world crisis, nations, as well as individuals, are being taught the power of prevailing prayer. In unison with women from all lands assembled, Devotional Day, in Philadelphia, will you not help awaken in the hearts of all people intelligent, conscientious zeal for the observance and enforcement of law. Let us rejoice in the high purpose and boundless possibilities of a new era in which our family of nations with Divine aid shall achieve victories for peace and purity, as well as for total abstinence and prohibition.

Sweden's Referendum Campaign Has Educated and Aroused The People

Unofficial reports of the result of the referendum on prohibition, August 27, indicate that the large wet vote in Stockholm overcame the dry sentiment in the country at large. The poll was, as has been stated, only a consultative referendum, taken to find out how strong was the desire for prohibition. The campaign has been of great educational value and has laid the foundation for work for a dry Sweden which will continue until the traffic in strong drink has been outlawed.

Have You Held a Campaign Tea?

Do you want to start something quite unique in the way of social functions in your community? Try a campaign tea, or better, a series of them. Ask some of the most influential members of the W. C. T. U., or their friends, who have beautiful homes, to act as hostesses. Invite to these teas the women who are known to be sceptical concerning the value of prohibition, or who are lukewarm or uninterested. Include in your invitations the members of every women's organization in your town. Have a carefully selected committee from your local union prepared to mingle with the guests, turn the conversation to the issue of the campaign, and tactfully answer arguments that may be raised or give information to those who are ignorant on the subject. Arrange for an attractive speaker who can present briefly and brilliantly the campaign issue and the responsibility of the women to vote and work for the election of dry Congressmen. Follow with a musical selection. Make the occasion very informal, and as delightful socially as possible. Serve tea or lemonade. As the guests depart present them with the series of seven leaflets, "Facts" and other literature that may help to crystallize into conviction the impression that has been made at the gathering.

Campaign teas of this character are proving very popular and successful in certain states. Southern California expects to hold 1,000 in September and October. Start the fashion in your city!

Defining the Real Issue of the Campaign

The Women's Committee of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment is in an intensive campaign to organize the women of this country for a return of light wines and beer, and expect, it is claimed, to enroll thousands and secure the votes of a majority of the women at the polls next November.

The measure of success of this committee will depend upon the extent to which they can deceive the women as to the real issue in the campaign. If the women can be persuaded that a modification of the Volstead Law to permit the traffic in light wines and beer will make possible the enforcement of law and safeguard their children, they will undoubtedly so vote.

The crying need from now until November 7 is to make plain to the women voters that the real issue raised by the A. A. P. A. is not the protection of youth from the "terrible results of prohibition" and the modification of the law so it can be enforced. The real issue is made plain at the big mass meetings of the Association, as, for example, last week at the Coliseum, in Chicago, when a speaker called for a rising vote as to how many present "would like a nice cool stein of beer." The issue can be defined in two terse words, APPETITE AND AVARICE, a desire for a drink of beer or wine on the part of some, and of others, a desire for the dollar that can be made from the sale of such drinks.

Put this issue clearly and definitely before the women of this nation, and who doubts how they will vote?

One of the planks of the platform of the A. A. P. A. is "no saloons," but the association refuses to explain how it expects the traffic in wines and beer is to be conducted without distributing centers. The only method apparently will be a bar in every grocery store, every soft drink emporium, every drug store, accessible to the young people of the community and made legally respectable, so that they will have no fear of patronizing it. Does any woman want to see legalized temptation thus placed before her sons and daughters?

And does any intelligent woman believe that the sale of liquors will be confined to light wines and beer? The purveyors of alcoholic beverages never have obeyed the law. Is there any guaranty that they would not violate the proposed law, and sell liquors of all degrees of alcoholic strength?

That the women of this nation in large numbers are awake to the real issue in this campaign is shown by the results of the more than twenty state primaries, where they voted in large numbers. Only one dry Congressman has been defeated, and of the new men nominated, two-thirds have been avowed drys.

The DOMINANT DUTY of the women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union during the next two months is to place the REAL ISSUE before the women voters. Put everything else aside for the next few weeks and canvass your community. Make opportunities for personal talks, use your telephone, and the mails. Bring the question before the church missionary societies, women's clubs, young people's societies, business and professional women's clubs and other organizations. See that every woman voter in your city is made intelligent on the REAL ISSUE of the campaign.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 17-19, 1922.

TRANSPORTATION NOTES

WORLD'S AND NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTIONS, NOVEMBER, 1922

Tour No 1. For those who wish to spend Saturday, November 11, in Washington, D. C., and who do not plan to go to Toronto.

A train on the Pennsylvania Railway will leave the Union Station, Chicago, Friday, November 10, at 10:30 a. m., arriving in Washington at 8:00 a. m. The day will be spent sightseeing, and the trip to Philadelphia will be resumed at 4:30 p. m., arriving in the convention city at 7:30 p. m. The return trip can be made at the delegates' pleasure as no special arrangements will be made by the transportation committee. Apply for reservations to W. E. Blachley, Division Passenger Agent, Pennsylvania Railway, 323 South Wells Street, Chicago.

Tour No. 2. For those who wish to attend the World League against Alcoholism meeting in Toronto, Canada, November 25-29.

A train on the New York Central will carry special cars for delegates leaving Chicago, Friday, November 10, at 5:00 p. m., connecting at Buffalo with the Lehigh Valley road. No change of cars will be necessary. Arrival at Philadelphia will be at 8:08 p. m. Apply for reservations to Mr. C. Hartigan, Ass't. Gen. Pass. Agt., New York Central Railroad, La Salle Street Station, Chicago.

Tickets on the going trip will be available on the Pacific Coast November 7 to 13 and in all other parts of the country and Canada, November 8 to 14. By either route, the one way fare, Chicago to Philadelphia, is $29.46. The return trip will be one-half of the regular fare. The Pullman fares are as follows from Chicago, either route: Lower berth, $8.25; upper, $6.60; drawing room, $30.00; compartment, $23.25.

The trip from Philadelphia to Toronto will be made on the Lehigh Valley road, leaving Philadelphia, Tuesday, November 21, at 8:40 p. m. Several hours will be spent at Niagara Falls, arriving in Toronto at 9:43 p. m., November 22. Tickets must be deposited at Buffalo by all delegates who hold tickets to any point east or west of Buffalo.

An agent of the railroad will be at the convention November 15 and 18 for the purpose of validating tickets. Immediately on arrival in Philadelphia tickets should be left at convention headquarters, the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, with Miss Elizabeth Newman, secretary of the transportation committee. On the return the final limit for leaving Philadelphia is December 1. Delegates must arrive at starting point December 3 for all but Pacific Coast points.

The fare from Buffalo to Toronto is $3.67. The pullman fare from Philadelphia to Toronto is as follows: lower berth, $5.25; upper, $4.20; drawing room, $19.50; compartment, $14.75. Reservations for this trip may be made at the convention.

The Pennsylvania and New York Central railroads have prepared a special letter covering details of trips mentioned, which may be obtained on application to the railroads.

It is very important that reservations for either tour from Chicago to Philadelphia should be made as soon as possible. If a sufficient number make reservations, either or both roads will run a special train for the exlusive use of the delegates.

Parties living east of Chicago may join either tour at the most convenient point; western delegates will join in Chicago.

Be sure to secure a certificate from your railroad agent at the time of purchasing your ticket. Do not make the mistake of asking for a receipt. No refund of fare will be made because of failure to secure certificate.

N. B. In order to secure reduced fare, tickets must be purchased going and returning over the same route.
